ESSAYS

OF

OLIVER GOLDSMITH

SELLCILD AND PURPLE

WITH INTRODUCTION AND NOTES

BY

CHARLES DUKE YONGE MA.

IALOW OF THE ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF FFEIRER, REGIUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMICAL HATBRATURE OF WODERN HISTORY, QUTFA'S COTTOT, RELIGIT, AND AUTHOR OF A CONSTITUTE AF HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN AND PICTURE, 1750-1780, RE

Landon

MACMILLAN AND CO, LIMITID

NEW YORK THE WALLEY COMPANY

1907

All rights regard

R CHARD CLAY AND SONS, LIL FISD,

BERGAY, SUSSOIL

Fort Felium, 1982, 8 cond Dillion, 1989,

Represted, 1895 (twice), 1901 1997

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

Essay		Pear
1	THE FAME MACRING A REVERIE, From 'The Bee,' No 5	1
H	On the Instability of Worldly Grandeur, Ib No 6	9
$\mathbf{III}$	CUSTOM AND LAWS COMPARED ID NO 7	13
IA	An Account of the Augustan Ace of England 16 No 8	17
v	CAROLAN THE IPISH BAPD Mesecilancous Essays, No 5	27
VI	NATIONAL CONCORD IN NO 15	30
VII	ASEM THE MAN-HATER, OR, A VINDICATION OF THE WINDOW OF GOD IN THE MORAL GOVERNMENT OF THE WORLD AN EASTERN TALE 110 NO 32	33
7111	ON THE ORIGIN OF PORTRY IN No. 19	42
IX	Portly distributioned from other Writing Ib No 20	55
X	THE TOVANIS OF THE LEASONIS HISTORY OF A FOLL'S GAPDEN 15 No 34	67
ΙΖ\	On the Sacactey of the Spider — $F_{tota}$ * $Tha$ — $B_{tot}$ * $No$ 4	72
XII	PPTI ACT 10 THE 'CHINESI LEGICES'	78
KIII	THE CHINEST PHILOSOPHLE VISITS WESTWINSTEI ABBEY 'Chinese Lellers,' No. 13	82
XIV	RECEPTION OF THE CHINESE PHILOSOPHIE IN A LADY OF DISTINCTION 11 NO 14	88
ΧA	Enchant Ticamert of Fieron Prisoners Ib	92
XVI	Imma Mar and David . If Non-Ro of	700

SLUGAT	ΩĽ	CONT	17379.

Į.		TABLE OF CONTINTS
	1.79		M T
	// 111 //	Princips of the Christ in Galbary C The Galbas of Virth and Art (Chine) I flor (No St	l (le
	XIZ	Anticory is the Person of Wishor B. No. 37	112
	ZZ	Turkyo iri seror Barusu Arabi (# No.55)	115
	X71	Escusulurris II No 50	123
	7711	The Chinese Philosophie is abstroug at Book fitted Re No. 51	127
	XXIII	The President Police of the Section States	100
	711/Z	Li 0/970 A Yevisi i sirko int Wolly	175
	171	THE GREAT EXPLINE PLANTING SHOW	100
	1777	Fortunt movie vor to 11 Brian # No 70
	7711	THE PRODUCTION OF GIVE TO BEAUTY AN	1 (6
•	HIVY	Exertist Shops and Shork fills 16 No 77
	ZZ1Z	THE LYDE OF INCELASING PLANELISM , 16 NO SO
	$\gamma \chi \chi$	THE LABIES' THAISS REDUCTION 16 NO 51	155
	//XI	AND DIFFUSION SERVING RESEARCH OF WHITE HIDE NOT 15 NO 24
	YXXII	THE MANEET IN WHICH SOME PRILO-OPHIES	361
	ЩИХХ	THE PROPER MUST BE CONTINUED TO IN THOSE WHOM THEY HAVE APPOINTED TO GOVERN A SHOPL TO THIS EXPLICE 1b.	165
	XXXIA	THE UNILITY AND ENTERY SENSE THAT MIGHT RESULT THOM A JOURNAL TO THE EAST ID NO 108	160
	XXV	A CONTESTED PLECTION ID NO 112	173
		10 No 112	177

INTRODUCTION.

A BRIEF SKETCH OF THE LIFE OF GOLDSMITH

OLIVER GOLDSMITH, the author of the Essays from which the present volume is but a selection, was born in 1728, at Pallas, a small panish in the county of Longford, in Ireland, of which his father, a younger son of a gentleman of good family, was curate In his childhood he was nearly cut off by a severe attack of smallpox, which not only permanently disfigured his features, but left behind it a general weakness which lasted for many years, and so greatly checked his mental, as well as his bodily progress, that his schoolmaster generally regarded him as a backward, it not a sturid boy, though at times he showed a readiness, and even bughtness, that led some of his friends to form a higher opinion of him, a judgment which his subsequent careci amply acquitted of undiscerning partiality. After pasing some years at school, first at Athlone, and riterwards at Edgeworthstown, he was removed to Trinity College, Dublin , but, though he had by that time outgrown his early weakness, he achieved no distinction, and was contented with an ordinary degree, which he obtained in 1749

Being the fifth child of a large family, he had no patrimony to look to, and therefore, on quitting the University it was necessary for him to choose a pro fession. His father had originally destined him for a commercial life, for which he was disinchined, and for which he was manifestly unsuited by his very unbusinesslike disposition. But now, by the urgent recommendation of one of his uncles by mainage, Mi Containe, vicar of Kilsnoie, he was persuaded to offer himself as a candidate for Holy Orders in the diocese of Elphin In his general respect for religion and virtue, and his kind, charitable disposition, he would have displayed no little resemblance to the exquisite picture of the "village preacher" in the 'Deserted Village,' which he is believed to have drawn from his own father, but he had not followed Mr Containe's advice very willingly, and was probably very little disconcented, when Dr Synge, the Bishop, rejected him according to his sister's account, because he had not yet reached the proper age, according to another report, which his fondness for gry dress readers by no means amprobable, because be presented houself in the unclerical attice of a pair of scarlet breeches 1

Whatever may have been the cause of his failure, it did not indispose Mi. Containe to make further efforts to assist him, and he procured him a private into ship in the family of a Mi. Firm, of Roscommon, but for some reason or other he soon weared of the situation, it seems probable that he found he was expected to must the duties of humble companion of the father to those of instructor of the sou in a way that was nksome to his independent spirit. Whatever may have been the cause, at the end of a few months he relinquished his post, and prepared to emigrate to one of our North American colonies, but the ship in which he had taken his par sage sailed sooner than he had expected, leaving him behind, and, as his fare, which had been prepaid, had taken nearly all his money, he was reduced to great difficulties It is characteristic of the impulsive good-nature which, to the end of his life, was a marked feature of his disposition, that, though he had only five shillings left to carry him back to his home, more than 100 miles distant, he gave half of it to a poor woman whom he met on the road, and who moved his compassion by a piteous tale of distress He calculated, indeed, on obtaining a further supply from a friend whom he himself had often obliged in a similar way, but who, on being applied to, ungratefully turned his benevolence and subsequent distress into ridicule, and gave him no aid beyond the present of an oak stick. which, following (unconsciously as we may suppose) the advice of Bishop Jewell to Hooker, he facetiously called a safe mag to carry mun forward on his tourney.1 Goldsmith, as he told the story to his mother, " was in some doubt whether he should not, in the first instance, apply it to his pate" But his unworthy friend's head was saved by the arrival of another

<sup>1</sup> See No XVII of this selection

<sup>1</sup> He has introduced this incident into the adventures of George Primrose, many of which were taken from his own everence. "You are going, my boy," cred I, "to London on toot, in the namica Hooker, your great ancestor, travelled there before you. Take from me the same house that was given him by the good Bishop Jewel, this staff"—Vian of Wed ifeld, c. 3 visitor, and Goldsmith contented himself with indding him put the steed back into his own stable. He now determined to study medicine, a science

He now determined to study medicine, a science for which he seems at all times to have entertained a predilection, and crossed over to Edinburgh to study the profession But he was not very well satisfied with the Scotch physicians, and at the end of the year he decided on removing to Leyden And a comical distress, which delayed his voyage, saved his life, he quitted Leith in a small smack for Newcastle, expecting there to find a vessel bound for Holland, but some of the passengers, though natives of Scotland, held commissions in the French service and, on his arrival at Newcistle, they were taken up on the charge of onlisting soldiers for the Pretender, and he was for a moment involved in the same accusation. and priested also But he was soon consoled for this enforced dolay, since the ship in which he had intended to sul was wiecked on her passage, and every soul on board was drowned However, he was sout on both we drow the line veryage with better fortune; into m May 1755 he reached Leyder. But life a time the Dutch physicians statisfied him no better than the Stotch had done and he about dened his medical studies, and resolved to spend some time in fractling, not being dounted by his want of funds, because he had heard of a Dimen scholar, "the famous Baron Holberg," who had recently traversed the greater part of Europe "on foot, without money, recommendations, or furnds, a good vorce and a trading Stall in music being the only finances he had to support an undertaking so extension, so had to wight some at the diports of travelled by day, and at right some at the diports of the peasants' houses to get himself a lodging "1 Goldsmith was not a singer, but he played the flute with considerable taste and some skall, and his instru ment was often put in requisition to pry for the hospitality which he received Oft, as he says of

"Would the village praise his wondious power, And dance forgetful of the noontule hour "

But he did not confine his visits to the poorer classes, at times when, by some means or other, his finances were m a better condition than usual, he mixed in higher somety. In one of his letters he even speaks of having beheld the beauties who graced the Court at Versulles, and he was received as a visitor by Voltane, of whose courtly manners, general ability, and, more especially, of whose wit and conversational powers, he conceived an enthusiastic admiration

From France he proceeded to Haly, and at Padua he is generally believed to have received the degree of Doctor of Medicine But he did not extend his brivels to the Southern provinces being apparently deferred by the sign of a speedy renewal of the war between France and England And in 1756 he returned to England, which except on the occasion of his detention at Newcastle, he had not yet seen Apparently his means, from whatever source they had been derived, were now exhiusted, for the variety of cocupetions in which, during the next few months. he engaged, is of itself a proof of the difficulty lir found in maintaining hym-elf. He become an usber in a school, then a chemist's assistant, then he set up as a physician in Southwark, but found that there was a prejudice against Scotch of Itish practitioners, which effectually cut him off from all hope of lumative practice; and the failure of his attempt involved him in greater distress than ever. There is a tradition that he joined a company of strolling players, which derives countenance from his description of the adventures of George Primiose, and many years afterwards, when fortune was smiling on him, he spoke of lumself as having at one time "lived among the beggas in Are Lane," a reminiscence which, if it had any foundation, must have referred to this period

T 77 5 .

<sup>. &#</sup>x27;Enquiry into the Frencht State of Polity Levining,' c. 6

But, as his happened in other instances, this extremity of distress drove him into the path of fame That exerted the same influence over him in London that nt had excepted over Persons seventeen hundred years before at Rome, and drove him as a last resource to seek a livelihood by his pen. Twenty years before Johnson, who was now enjoying the linghest repuirtion among the literary men of the period, had begun as a writer in magazines, and publications of that hand had recently multiplied Besides the Gentle-

> "Magister artis, ingenfique l'agritor Venter "3

Trustated by Dryden -

"Who trught the parrot human notes to try, Or with a rose orded the chattering pro? Twas witty want, ficree hunger to appears, Want taught then masters, and their masters these "--Tran lation of the Prelogai to Persons' Salites And so, in 'The Vierr of Wakefield,' Goorge Promiose is repre sented is telling his father how, among other expedients for obtaining a hyelihood, he tried "to write for bread"

man's Magazine,' there were the 'Monthly Review,' the 'Critical Review,' the 'British Magazine,' the 'Public Ledger,' and to all these he began to send in contributions, the ment of which was soon perceived by the reading public, and, consequently, by the publishers By the beginning of 1759 he had become so well known that Dodsley, the leading publisher of the day, listened favourably to his proposals of a separate work, 'An Enquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe, which was very generally praised, though in it he had the boldness to assail the whole body of professed cutaes as a class of writers whose increase was both a proof and a cause of the decline of learning "Leaining," he contended, "may be distinguished into three periods . its commencement, or the age of poets, its maturity, or the age of philosopheis, and its decline, or the age of critics" But, though this seemed like a deliberate challenge to that brotherhood, the challenge remained unanswered The little volume was too highly praised for them to venture to attack it, and he soon had the proofs he most desired of the esteem in which it was held. He had no longer to seek admission on the staff of publishers and editors, they began to seek him. In the autumn of 1751 a publisher named Wilkie projected a periodical called 'The Bee,' to consist entirely of essays, and of those all that have survived were the work of Goldsmith And before the end of the year, Smollett, then in the height of his reputation as a novelist and historian, sought his co-operation in a magazine which, on the first day of 1760, he began to publish under such patronage as no other work before or since has ever received George II anot generally a very enthusiastic patron of hterature, having granted his formal permission that 'The British Magazine, or Monthly Repository for Gentlemen and Ladies,' should be announced as published "by the king's authority". To this magazine Goldsmith, while it lasted, was a frequent contributor, but with the publisher of another, which was first issued in the same month, under the title of the 'Public Ledger,' he made a more formal and permanent arrangement For £100 1 yeu he undertook to furnish papers of an amusing character twice a week, and it is to this ongagement is owing that series of papers on which his reputation as an escapist of the very first class is chiefly founded More than one willer had put forth comments on passing events in the character of a foreign traveller. A Geneeve, named Marana, had led the way with a volume which had recently been translated into English, under the title of 'The Turkish Spy' The celebrated Montesquieu had imitated him in the 'Lettres Persannes' And now Goldsmith, adopting the same idea, surpressed both the Itahan and the Frenchman Above a year before, in a sportive letter to one of his linch firends, he had imagined a Chinese philosopher in a futine age commenting to his pupils on the excellence of some works which, though anonymou-, were m fact the production of one Oliver Goldsmith, who flourished in the 18th and 19th centuries, and lived to be 103 years old And he now revived the idea, with the modification of making his Chinese philosopher a contemporary travelling in England, and communicating his remarks on what he saw to his friends at home. In the fourth number of the 'Public Ledger' he inserted a humorous preface on the character of Chinese authors and writings, apparently intended to show that their style closely resembled what that of a Butish Essayist was, or ought to be-" The Chinese are always concise: they are simple, they are grave and sententious" And the Preface was accompanied by the first of the traveller's letters Two more appeared in the course of the next week; and they instintly became so popular as to form the chief attraction of the 'Ledger' Such they continued to be through more than a hundred numbers; and though more than a century has elapsed since their first appearance, the applause which then greeted them has lost little of its warmth or vigour When afterwards collected and repunted in a separate volume they were entitled 'The Citizen of the World,' and this, though a far less descriptive or accurate title, is that by which they have since been generally known A connected series of papers naturally takes higher rank than a single detached essay, however heely or sensible, and the plan of these letters admitted an infinite diversity of subjects and treatment. Juvenal had proposed to himself to embrace in his satires all that men do, or wish, or fear, or delight in, or are offended at, and Goldsmith

Mr Bryanton of Ballymahon The letter is dated Aug 14, 1758, and is given at length by Prior in lus Life, 1 265

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Quicquid agunt homines, votum, timor, 112, voluptas, Gaudia, discursus, nostii est furago libelli "—1 80

Translated by Dryden .-

&quot;Whatever since that golden age was done, What human kind desires, and what they shun, llage, passions, pleasures, impotence of will, Shall this estimal collection fill."

made the lucubritains of his philosophical traveller equally comprehensive. The wisdom and the value, the werknesses, the follors of these among whom for the moment his lot is cret equally attract his notice, and in all his sentiments and language us such as become a philosopher, his consule, when he is compelled to blawe, grave without butterness, his laughter, when he cannot but laugh, hearty without apperity or indeness

The letters at once established his fame as an essayist of the very first class, and caused his acquantance to be sought by all who felt or professed a love for literature—a body which at that time included no inconsiderable number of persons of tashion of both sexes. Bunke was so connected with Dodsley, as the editor of the 'Annual Register,' that it is probable that he had already become acquainted with his countryman, and Dr Percy, afterwards famous as the Bishop of Dremore, and the editor of the well-known 'Reliques of English Poetry,' had sought him out a year or two before, and now introduced him to Johnson, who by this time had come to be recognised as a supreme authority on all literary questions, and who was authory on an interact questions, and who has authorized to his acquiratence, regriding him as "one of the very first men we now had as an nathor, and a very worthy man too" (Dosmell's 'Lafe of Johnson,' 1 388). The acquiratione speedily ripened into intimacy, and we are indebted to it for much of our knowledge of Goldsmith's babits and way of living, since he was too important a member of Johnson's society to be passed over by his biographer Boswell, though Boswell does not always place him in the most favourable light The biographer was far from being the stupid person that Miraulty represents him but it is very probable that Mr. Prior is right in thinking him realous of Goldsmith's large share of Johnson's friendship which he desired to monopolice And Mr Prior has certainly proved that some of the stories of foolish sayings and actions which Boswell attributes to him are entirely void of foundation Johnson introduced him to Reynolds; and when, a year or two afterwards, these celebrated friends founded "The Club." which still flourishes as "The Laterary Club," Gold-mith was invited to become one of the original members 1 And he had hardly joined it when he established beyond all dispute his right to a high place in such a society, by the pubhertion of 'The Traveller,' a poem which, if it's comparative brevity compels us to rank it as but a cabinet picture when compared with other works of greater magnitude, yet for truth and purity of feeling, for correctness of imagery and delicacy of execution, need fear a comparison with few of its bulkier and more pretentious rivals. It was at once pronounced the finest poem that had been written since the death of Pope, and Mr Prior points out that it's plan is emmently entitled to the praise of originality, since it was a new feature in 'Travels' to dwell more upon the moral characteristics of the people of the different countries described than upon the local features and scenery And he claims for its author the merit of being, in this respect, the precursor and model of Lord Byron, whose 'Childe

&lt;sup>1</sup> See an account of "The Club" in Lord Stanhope's 'History of England,' vi. 478

Harold "in all its leading point, may be considered a kind of 'Traveller' on a more extended 'cile" ('Lafe of Goldsmith,' u. 27.)

The fame he had acquired did not make him idle Indeed, has pen was still his only hackboad; and his labours as an e-sayut, an editor, and accusionally as a biographer, were unremitting. There were those who would firm have induced him to embrah m an additional kind of work, which imdoubtedly they would have found means to make profit the to hun At one time, we do not I now the precise occusion, Dr Scott, chaplant to Land Sandrach, and known hunself as a diligent party pumphleteer, was sent to him by the Government of the day, "to office him carte blanche if he would write in support of the administration" To Dr Scoti's istorish ment, and, indeed, indignation, he rejected the proposal, though accompanied with an offer of the most liberal payment. As Dr Scott described his answer, " He was so absurd as to say, I can can as much as will supply my wants without writing for uny party, the assistance therefore you offer is unnecessary to me." We may differ from Di Scott, and think that a man who, though hving "in a miserable set of chambers in the Temple," could thus decline offers which must bind him to defend measures which in his heart, perhaps, he did not approve, but his support of which was to be munificently rewarded, displayed not "absurdity," but an independence of spirit which can hardly be too much admired. And, at all events, it will hardly be denied that, if a bargam had been struck which had given us, instead of 'The Deserted Village,'

<sup>1</sup> Prior's 'Life of Goldspith' n 278

'The Vicar of Wakefield,' and 'She Stoops to Conquer,' political pamphlets such as the 'False Alarm,' and 'Taxation no Tyranny,' the gain to the existing administration would have been more than counterbalanced by an incalculable loss to the literature of the country and of the world

His boast that he could earn by his pen enough to supply his wants was not ill-founded admiration excited by his poem, coupled with the success of his 'Chinese Letters,' had given the London publishers so high an idea not only of his genius, but also of its versatility, that proposals for works of a wholly different kind crowded upon him, for all of which the publishers agreed to pay large sums Mr Prior has printed agreements between him and the projectors of different historical works, by which he was to receive a hundred guineas for each volume. His first work of the land was a 'History of Rome,' in two volumes, which Johnson extelled as a plain narrative, "telling the reader chortly all he could want to know, and written in a style that would bear frequent re-perusal" And he maintained that, as such, it was far superior to ' Robertson's cumbrous detail." It was followed by a 'History of England,' on a sumlar scale, and that by a 'History of Greece' And the publishers ex-pected even more from a 'Natural History of Animals,' which he undertook, and of which the first volumes were only published a few months before his death. It was not, perhaps, a subject with which he was especially qualified to deal, as his acquaintance with it was undoubtedly superficial; but Johnson, while allowing him no great

tyin INTRODUCTION

knowledge of it, prophesied that "he would make it as entertaining as a Persian tale, he had the art of compiling, and of saying everything he had to say in a pleasing manner." And this, perhaps, is the utmost maise that can fairly be given to his his torical works They were written in a lively, annuated, and emmently pure style, and procured him the term kable compliment of being appointed Professor of History to the Royal Academy, on the original establishment of that famous institution, but, though abridgments of them, which were also executed by himself, long kept then place as schoolbooks, they have been superschild by other works of higher protensions and greater research. Where he was unsurpresed was in works of a more original character, in which his fancy could expiritate without the restraint imposed by facts upon a historian The success of 'The Traveller' naturally tempted him to seek fresh glory in the field of poetry, and it was soon known that he was employing himself on a poem founded in a great measure on his own early recollections. On none of his works did he ever bestow an equal amount of care and labour We are assured that he employed two years in giving it the highest degree of polish, but, before he sent at forth to the world, a further proof of his versatility had been afforded by his appearance as the author of a novel, 'The Vicar of Wakefield' Its publication forms quite an era in the history of fiction. In the plot, and in the management of the details of the story, there are not a few meconsistenemes, to which, indeed, he may be regarded as pleading guilty in the short preface or advertise-ment which he prenxed to it, and which begins with the admission that "There are a hundred faults in this thing, and a bundled things might be said to prove them beauties. But it is needless A book may be amusing with numerous errors, or it may be very dull without a single absurdity." The verdict instantly given by the whole body of readers was, that it was "amusing," and something more That it was, to borrow by anticipation the character given of it by one of the very few novelists who have surpassed it, Sir Walter Scott, " one of the most delicious morsels of fictitious composition on which the human mind was ever employed." In his advertisement he had disclaimed for it pretensions to wit or humour, but the correctness of the disclaimer was not acknowledged by its readers. On the contrary, many of the opening chapters are instinct with the very richest humour, many, too, with a touching pathos What is even more admirable, by reason of the qualities of an opposite character which disfigure the majority, and especially the most brilliant novels of that and the preceding generation, is the undeviating purity of the work in every part, in the conception of the whole, and in the execution of the details. And the combination of these qualities was at once recognised by the unprecedented demand which arose for it. It was not published till the end of March 1766 Before the end of the year it had run through three editions, nor was its popularity confined to this country It was translated into French, Italian and German, and to this day it is frequently used in more than one foreign school as the book from which youthful pupils may be most profitably taught the English language

The delight caused by 'The Vicar of Wakcheld' had not subsided when the author came forward in a new character, that of a dramatist. Again, in the purity of his scenes, exhibiting a creditable difference from the come writers of the preceding generation, whose aim appeared to have been to throu over the most shameless profugacy the moticion of the most sparkling wit. Goldsmith's comedies are but two 'The Good-natured Man' and 'She Stoops to Conquer' And it is remarkable that neither of the theatrical managers of the day, Garrick nor Coleman, was sanguine of their success. That of the former of the two was indeed but moderate, it contrins more than one scone of great humour, but they no counterbalanced by others which can hardly be denied to be rather tedious. But the second, 'She Stoops to Conquer,' 25 put beyond the seach of criticism or disparagement by the simple fact, that above a century after its first representation, it is still a favourite, and in the metropolitan and country theaties is still constantly acted, and never without applicuse, and, what the author himself considered the surest test of the merit of a comedy, laughter Indeed, next to the masterpieces of Shendan, it will probably be very generally admitted to have been the best comedy produced in the last hundred years

All these successes only heightened the eagerness with which the long-promised poem was looked for, and at last, in May 1770, it came out under the title of 'The Deserted Village,' and it surpassed in popularity even the most admired of his previous works Before the end of June three more editions were published and sold, and the favour which greeted its first appearance, being founded on real and sold beauties, can hardly be said to be diminished at the present day. Then brouty, as has been previously confessed, may cause it and 'The Traveller' to be regarded but as cabinet pictures, when compared with longer poems in many books, but length is a very unsafe and delustic criterion of excellence, and, however they may surpass it in length, few poems in the language equal the real poetic feeling which pervaded the new poem, its ease and grace, or its truth to nature, equally conspicuous in the pictures drawn of scenery and of persons; of "The never-fuling brook, the busy mill,

<sup>1 &#</sup>x27;She Stoops to Communer' was, however, a later work than 'The Deserted Village'

The decent church that tops the neighbouring hill,
The hawthorn bush with seats beheath the shade,
For talking age and whispering lovers made."

or of "the village preacher,"

"Passing rich with forty pounds a year "

The "village schoolmaster," of severer temper, "the long-remembered beggar", and "the broken soldier," who, cheered by the vicar's sympathy,

"Wept o'er his wounds or tales of sorrow done, Shoulder'd his crutch, and show'd how fields were won "

No doubt the poem owed much of its beauty and power to the fact that it was founded almost wholly on his personal experience. The village of Lassoy, near Ballymahon, where much of his youth was passed, and of which his brother Henry was the

INTRODUCTION genius It was such as could only have been called forth by the still more valuable qualities of the heart Bunke burst into tears on hearing of his death, and the great painter Reynolds was so affected that he laid down his brush, and was too much overcome to resume it for the rest of the day He was buried in the graveyard of the Temple Church, and a monument elected to his memory in Westminster Abbey-a medallion, giving a futhful representation of his features, accompanied by an epitaph from the pen of Johnson, which, however eulogistic, did not go beyond the writer's honest conviction. It declared that there was scarcely any kind of composition that Goldsmith had not attempted, and not one which he had attempted in which he had not excelled It was a grand panegync to have been earned by a man who was only forty-five years old at his death. Not was it a fleeting sentiment that thus honoured his memory with tokens of sorrow and admination A hundred years after he had passed away, Tunity College, where he had completed his education, resolved to honous itself by commemorating the genus of the most bulliant ornaments of literature that it had ever sent forth, and the great contemporaries, Goldsmith and Burke, were rightly chosen as the two men whose works had reflected the greatest honour on the University and the country, and when two bionze statues faithfully representing their features were placed in front of the college gates, the general voice, not only of their native Ireland, but of every nation by which the English Linguage is spoken, pronounced that few compliments had ever been paid which acflected greater honour, not only on those who were the objects of them, but on those who paid them

XXIII

It would occupy too much of our space to enter here into an examination of Goldsmith's merits as poet, novelist, and draimitist. It is only as an Essayist that we have to deal with him in this volume, and it may not be out of place to preface our remarks on him in this character with a few general observations on the history and character of English Essay writing, especially since that class of composition is more cultivated at the present day than at any preceding period.

Johnson, in his Dictionary, defines an essiy as "a loose sally of the mind, an integular, undigested piece of composition," and subcequently, as " a trial" (which, indeed, seems to be the strictly etymological meaning of the word), quoting Glanville, who, in the preface to one of his own compositions, says-"this treatise paides itself on no higher title than an essay, or imperfect attempt at a subject" Johnson's definition of "a treatise" being "a discourse, a written tractate" It will hardly be said that this explanation is clearer than the word it professes to explain But, from a general point of view, it may perhaps be laid down, though it is difficult to draw a precise line of distinction between the two, that a treatise differs from an essay in being more elaborate and copious, to use a modern phrase, more exhaustive With this understanding, we may say that of the Opuscula of Cicero the De Senectule and De Amuntia are treatises, the Paradova are essays Among modern nations the English and the French are those by which essay writing has been most studied, though the earliest modern essayist was the great Italian Machiavelli; a man, like our Goldsmith, of singular versatility, dramatist, poet and historian. His short compositions on Florentine Reforms, on the nature of Frenchmen, on the affairs of Germany, are clearly essays, not treatises, and some might be inclined to add to these his shrewd commentaries on Livy A Frenchman too, Montaigne, preceded the earliest of our English essayists, but no two writers could be more unlike than the Florentine and the Frenchman Machiavelli being always as clear as he was profound in his views, close in his argument, and accurate in his language, while it cannot be denied that Montaigne is open to the charge that Goldsmith brings against him,1 of having been "during his whole life incapable of thinking connectedly" And it may be that he owes no small portion of the popularity which he enjoys among his countrymen to the contrast which his nambling style of thinking and writing, "without any decided plan, or distinct object, often ignorant whither he is going, but never in doubt whither he designs to go" (to quote the words of one who is not less a warm admirer than a shrewd critic), affords to the logical precision of thought and language, which are the more usual characteristics of his fellon-countrymen

It was equally different from the style of the English writer, who in some degree may be called his contemporary, Francis Bacon, Loid St Alburs Montaigne died in 1592, and Bacon published his first series of cesays in 1597.2 They was escays in

<sup>1</sup> Review of Creeie's 'Tusculan Disputations' Miscellaneous Works vol 17, p 413

&#x27; Brographic Universelle,' see Montaigne

INTRODUCTION

XXVI

the strictest sense of Johnson's definition, attempts at a subject, slight sketches of it, hints suggesting further reflections to the reader; brief but most pregnant texts to be pendered on, and enlarged upon by others. We may be at a loss whether to call Milton's 'Areopagitica' an essay or a treatise, and we should undoubtedly give the name of treatise to Dryden's composition on 'Sating' and 'Diamatic Poesy,' had not be hunself entitled them essays. They are mesterpieces of critical comment and exposition, evidently intended to exhaust the subjects with which they deal. And one of them, the 'Essay on Diamatic Poesy,' may be thought more especially designed to show this intention, since in it he has, to some extent, unitated Plate, representing his work as a discussion between several interlocutors The next, the eighteenth century, however, is that which, in the history of our national literature, may be specially denominated the age of the essayists Steele led the way Periodical papers had, indeed, been previously published at intervals, most commonly on questions of policy (we do not, however, include political pumphlets in our ideas of essays), but in some instruces on matters of taste, or morthity, 1 but even the names of them and of their authors have for the most part penshed, and indeed they probably did not deserve to live But in the middle of the reign of Queen Anne, Steele projected a series on a new plan He cilled it the 'Tatler,' and the name was indicative of the class of matter that was designed to be found in it. As he hoped to obtain for it a circulation in the provinces as well as in London, it was to appear three days in <sup>3</sup> Sea Macaulay's article on Addison

INTRODUCTION ווֹעאַג every week, those on which the post left London, and it was to diffuse the gossip of the great city, on points of fashion, on dress, on the charms of reigning beauties, in short, on every topic which engaged the attention of the idle or curious. He himself had already achieved a fair popularity as a dramatist, and in his new undertaking he sought the assistance of Addison, who as a literary man was as yet chiefly known as the author of a poem of very moderate ment, composed to celebrate the battle of Blenheim, but who could bring political influence to aid in promoting the circulation of any work in which he engaged, masmuch as he was Chief Secretary in Ireland, and a member of the Insh Parliament, Addison embraced the proposal with eagerness, and the alliance so formed was very fortunate for the senies, but less so for the original projector, since, as Steele himself confessed, the popularity of his own articles was greatly overshadowed by those furnished by his friend. The 'Tatler,' after lasting nearly two years, was discontinued to give place to the 'Spectator,' by the same authors, with the aid of other writers of inferior mark, who had also been occasional contributors to its predecessor That also was continued for about the same length of time, when it gave way to the 'Guardian,' which, however, had no very long life, and after an interval of some years, and in a new teign, was succeeded by the 'Freeholder' They had all a large, for the time an extraordinary circulation; but that which in the eyes of the later generations, is the representative of ill is unques-tionably the 'Spectator', and, according to the same judgment, the 'Spectator' is little more than

INTRODUCTION

XXVIII

Addison As the personification of the 'Spectator,' the ments of Addison have been extelled by two enthusiastic admirers. Johnson closes the bio graphical sketch of him which is contained in the 'Lives of the Poets,' with panse of the "genuine Anghesam" of his style, "What he attempted he performed, he is never feeble, and he did not wish to be energetic, he is never rapid, and he never stagantes His sentences have neither studied amplitude, not affected brevity, his periods, though not diligently rounded, are voluble and easy Who ever wishes to obtain an English style, familiar but not coarse, elegant but not estentatious, must give his days and nights to the study of Addison" This last sentence is a manifest imitation of Quinti han's enlogy of Cicero, but we may suspect that our Doctor was led thus to borrow the eulogy of the great Roman critic for his own count.yman, by a consciousness how widely the style of Addison differed from his own For he was too acute and too candid not to be aware of the defects of his own, which on one occasion he described as having "too big words, and too many of them" Otherwise it might have occurred to him that one part of his panegyric, to a certain extent, disproves the other, for that a style, which never aims at being "energetic," must mevitably at times be "feeble" And we think it is generally felt that not unfrequently, especially in his moral essays, Addison is feeble, and, to use a modern expression, prosy His critical articles, especially those on 'Paradise Lost,' are almost universally admitted to be unworthy both of the subject and of the author 1 " His se profecisse seist eur Cicero valde placebit"

More recently, one of the most distinguished writers of the last generation, whose disposition, however, always led him to run into extremes whether of praise or blame, while he fully endorses all Johnson's praise of his style, adds to it an enumeration of almost every conceivable excellence. According to Lord Macaulay, in humour he surpasses Swift, and even Voltaire; in wit he excels Congreve; in ingenuity and liveliness of allegory be outdoes Lucian, in keen observation of, and slv satire on, the follies of the age, he equals Horace, in rich colouring he outvies the 'Arabian Nights', in scenes from common life he rivals Goldsmith; and, to crown all, his "religious meditations will bear a comparison with the finest passages of Massillon" We will not quote an old verse which affirms that some praise is "satire in disguise," nor would we for a moment withhold our cordial assent to the assertion that the lessons of morality which Addison inculcates are always pure, that he observed varieties of character with penetrating shrewdness, and painted them with a delicate humour always under the contiol of good-nature and good-breeding We will at present content ourselves with pointing out that these admissions, which are made with cordial willingness, do not involve the assertion that even in these qualities he had no equal

Something less than forty years after the publication of the last 'Freeholder,' Johnson himself entered the same arena, with the 'Rambler' and 'Idler,' to wards both of which he received so few contributions from other writers, and those so unimportant, that they may both be regarded as the work of him alone But, though his reputation as a great thinker and talker created a fair demand for them at the time, they have long ceased to attract notice, and are known only to the curious. In truth his magniloquent and cumbrous fashion of spenking and writing, on no subject very well adapted to attract the generality of readers, was especially unsuitable for that lighter class of hierature, which if it cannot be read with ease is not hiely to be read at all Still, as they sold for a time, they stimulated imitation, and in the 'Life of Johnson' we see occasional mention of the 'Adventurer,' the 'Connorscur,' and the 'World,' none of which however maintained an which have long been forgotten

But between the publication of the 'Rambler' and the 'Idler,' Goldsunth, as we have seen, settled in London to earn a livelihood by his pen, and, as has been already mentioned, began with contributions of essays to different magazines, and the appearance of the caller 'Climese Letters' was nearly concident with the issue of the last numbers of the 'Idler' As we have already seen, their excellence was at once existence for more than a few months, and all of

with the issue of the last numbers of the 'Idler' As we have already seen, their excellence was at once acknowledged Johnson frankly owned the author's superiority to himself in that class of composition And we may fairly infer from the tones in which he from time to time spoke of both, that he would have heastated to assert his inferiority even to Addison We have seen the ments which Lord Macaulay attributes to the latter, and, without attempting to institute any formal comparison between the two, we may fairly contend that many of the excellences which Lord Maculay attributes to the one are found in high perfection in the other also. If we seek for ingenuity and liveliness of allegory the tale of

'Azem the Manhater,' or the description of 'The Gardens of Virtue and Vice,' furnishes ample proof that in fictions of this kind Goldsmith need have feared no rivalry If we desire some Horatian pleasantry on fashionable follies, the description of the reception of the Chinese philosopher by the fine lidy, or of the way in which he found himself at the mercy of the puffing shopkeeper, will sufficiently gratify the most exacting taste for such delicate sature It may be admitted that in none of his essays has Goldsmith drawn a character with the delicate discernment and humour and the elaborate finish which charm us in the portrait of Sir Roger de Coverley , but his pictures of the whole Primrose Family, of the amiable and venerable father, of the simple son with his gross of green spectacles, and of the outdoing of the monotonous gallery of the Miss Flamboroughs, with an orange apiece in their hands, by the grand historical group which proved too large to pass through any door in the house, show that it was only because the plan of the 'Chinese Letters' did not admit of so detailed a delineation of a single character that they contain no counterpart to Sn Roger

Roger

But besides these lighter graces, the essays of Goldsmth are rich in more solid excellences; they maintain throughout as high a standard of vintious feeling and moral purity as is to be found in John son himself, who aimed especially at the fame of a rigid moralist, they are pervaded throughout with an instructive honesty that never patters with truth They display, moreover, a largeness of view, and especially an accuracy of political judgment, which few writers, if any, of the century, except, perhaps,

Swift, had hitherto displayed. It has been often dwelt upon as a proof of Lord Chesterfield's political foresight that he discerned signs of the revolutionary spirit which was beginning to animate the French many years before it was developed in action. Lord Chesterfield was a professed politician, but in this instance of sagacity he was not superior to the scholar in his gailet, who, in one of the 'Chinese Letters,' is at least equally distinct in his utterance of the very same prediction, and who, in his advocacy of a relaxation of the penal law-, shows himself in advance of every statesman of his ago, suggesting the very reforms which, above half a century afterwards, Remilly and Mackintosh made it their glory to promote Johnson admitted that in style Addison did not wish to be energetic, but Goldsmith, not less easy and elegant, when case and elegance are all that his subject demands, exhibits, when dealing with graver subjects, a terseness and vigour which perhaps no other writer of the century, except Swift, has equalled

It may be added that, though we are here speaking of him only as an essay ist, in other banches of literature norther Addison nor Johnson can be compared to him for a moment. Flattery itself could never place the 'Campaign,' nor even 'The Vanity of Human Wishes,' on a level with 'The Deserted Village', nor 'Cato' or 'Irene' with 'She Stoops to Conquer', nor compare 'Rasselas,' to 'The Vicar of Wakefield'. Nor should it be forgotten in our estimation of Gold smith's genius that all these great works were produced in fifteen years, and that the author had scarcely reached middle age when he was prematurely cut off. Literature his rarely sustained a greater loss, and probably no one who reflects on his genus and his industry will question the justice of Johnson's conclusion, that the longer he had hived the better he would have deserred his place among the great writers of the nation in the great National Abbey.

Abby.

Goldsmith hunself, in one of his toriess, complians of the great difficulty of making a selection from works when all are equally good. His own great variety renders such a task one of expecial difficulty in his case. In such a publication as the present it is impossible to avoid the omission of much that one would have desired to insert. But the aim of the Editor has been to give the reader an idea of the versatility of Goldsmith's genius, by showing the skill with which he deals with every variety of subject.

GOLDSMITH'S ESSAYS.

I.

THE FAME MACHINE A REVERIE FROM 'THE BEE,' No. 5

Scancely a day passes in which we do not hear compliments paid to Dryden, Pope, and other writers of the last age, while not a month comes forward that is not loaded with invectives against the writers of this Strange, that our critics should be fond of giving their favours to those who are insensible of grang than thouse of the objection, and their dislike to those who, of all mankind, are most apt to retabate the injury.

Even though our present writers had not equal ment with their predecessors, it would be politic to use them with ceremony Every compliment paid them would be more agreeable, in proportion as they least descred it. Tella lady with a handsome face that she is pretty, she only thinks it her due, it is what she has heard a thousand times before from others, and disregards the compliment but assue a lady the cut of whose visage is something more plain, that she looks killing to-day, she instantly bridles up, and feels the force of the well-timed flattery the whole day after. Compliments which we think are deserved, we accept only as debts, with indifference;

2

but those which conscience informs us we do not meit, we receive with the same gratitude that we do favous given away

Our gentlemen, however, who preside at the distribution of literary fame, seem resolved to part with praise neither from motives of justice no generosity one would think, when they take pen in hand, that it was only to blot reputations, and to put their seals to the packet which consigns every new-horn effort to oblivion.

Yet, notwithstanding the republic of letters hangs at present so feebly together—though those friendships which once promoted literary fame seem now to be discontinued—though every writer who now draws the quill seems to aim at profit, as well as applause,—many among them are probably laying in stores for immortality, and are provided with a sufficient stock of reputation to last the whole journey.

As I was indulging these reflectaons, in order to eke out the present page, I could not avoid pursuing the metaphor of going a journey in my imagination, and formed the following Reverse, too wild for allegory, and too regular for a dream

I farened myself placed in a yard of a large inn, in which there was an infinite number of waggons and stage-conches, attended by fellows who either invited the company to take their places, or were busied in packing their baggage. Each vehicle had its inscription, showing the place of its destination. One 1 could read, The Pleasure Stage Coach, on another, The Waggon of Industry, on a third, The Vanity Whim, and on a fourth, The Landau of Riches. I had some inclination to step into each of these, one after another; but, I know not by what means. I passed them by, and at last fixed my eye upon a small carriage, berlin fashion, which seemed the most convenient vehicle at a distance in the world, and upon my nearer approach found it to be The Fame Machine

17

I instantly made up to the coachman, whom I found to be an affable and seemingly good-natured fellow He informed me, that he had but a few days ago returned from the Temple of Fame, to which he had been carrying Addison, Swift, Pope, Steele. Congreye, and Colley Cibber, that they made but indifferent company by the way, and that he once or twice was going to empty his berlin of the whole cargo: "However," says he, "I got them all safe home, with no other damage than a black eye, which Colley gave Mr Pope, and am now returned for another coachful "-" If that be all, friend," said I, "and if you are in want of company, I'll make one with all my heart Open the door. I hope the machine rides easy "__"Oh, for that, siz, extremely easy," But still keeping the door snut, and measuring me with his eye, "Pray, sir, have you no luggage? You seem to be a good-natured sort of gentleman, but I don't find you have got any luggage, and I never permit any to travel with me but such as have something valuable to pay for coach-bue" Examining my pockets, I own I was not a little disconcerted at this unexpected rebuff, but considering that I carried a number of the BEE under my arm, I was resolved to open it in his eyes. and dazzle him with the splendour of the page. He read the title and contents, however, without any emotion, and assured me he had never heard of it before "In short, friend," and he, now loing all his former respect, "you must not come in I expect better presengers, but as you seem a harmless creature, perhaps, if there be room left, I may let you ride a while for charity."

I now took my stand by the eachman at the door, and since I could not command a sent, was resolved to be a weful as possible, and earn by my assubuty what I could not by my ment. The next that presented for a place was a most whimsical figure indeed. He was hung round with papers of his own composing, not unlike those who sing ballads in the streets, and came dancing up to the door with all the confidence of instant admittance The volubility of his motion and address prevented my being able to read more of his rarge that the word Inspector, which was written in great letterat the top of some of the papers. He opened the coach door lumself without any ceremony, and was just slipping in, when the coachman, with as little ceremon), pulled him bick. Our figure scemed perfectly angry at this repulse, and demanded gentleman's satisfaction. "Lord, sir!" replied the conchinan, "instead of proper lugginge, by your bulk you seem loaded for a West India voyage You are big enough, with all your papers, to crack twenty stage-conches Excuse me, indeed, sir, for you must not enter" Our figure now began to expostulate, he assured the coachman, that though his biggage seemed so bulky, it was perfectly light, and that he would be contented with the smallest corner of soom But Jehu was inflexible, and the carrier of the Inspectors was sent to dance back again, with all his papers fluttering in the wind We expected to have 11

no more trouble from this quarter, when, in a few minutes, the same figure changed his appearance, like hailequin upon the stage, and with the same confidence again made his approaches, diessed in lace, and carrying nothing but a nosegay. Upon coming nearer, he thrust the nosegay to the coachman's nose, grasped the brass, and seemed now resolved to enter by violence I found the struggle soon begin to grow hot, and the coachman, who was a little old, unable to continue the contest, so, in order to ingratiate myself, I stepped in to his assistance, and our united efforts sent our literary Proteus, though worsted, unconquered still, clear off, dancing a rigadoon, and smelling to his own nosegay

The person who after him appeared as candidate for a place in the stage came up with an air not quite so confident, but somewhat, however, theatrical, and, instead of entering, made the coachman a very low how, which the other returned, and desired to see his baggage; upon which he instantly produced some farces, a tragedy, and other miscellany productions The coachman, casting his eye upon the cargo, assured him, at present he could not possibly have a place, but hoped in time he might aspire to one, as he seemed to have read in the book of nature, without a careful perusal of which none ever found entrance at the Temple of Fame. "What!" replied the disappointed poet, "shall my tragedy, in which I have vindicated the cause of liberty and virtue "-" Follow nature," returned the other, "and never expect to find lasting fame by topics which only please from their popularity. Had you been first in the cause of freedom, or praised in virtue more than an empty name, it is possible you might have gained admittance, but at present I beg, sir, you will stand aside for another gentleman whom I see approaching " This was a very grave personage, whom at some distance I took for one of the most reserved, and even disagreeable, figures I had seen, but as he approached his appearance improved, and when I could distinguish him thoroughly, I perceived that, in spite of the severity of his brow, he had one of the most good-natured countenances that could be imagined Upon coming to open the stage door, he lifted a parcel of folios into the seat before him, but our inquisitorial coachinan at once shoved them out "What I not take in my Dictionary?" exclaimed the other in a rage "Be patient, sn," replied the coachman . "I have drove a coach, man and boy, these two thousand years, but I do not remember to have carried above one dictionary during the whole time That little book which I perceive peeping from one of your pockets, may I presume to ask what it contains?"-" A mere trifle," replied the author, "it is called the Rambler" -"The Rambler!" says the coachman "I beg, sir, you'll take your place, I have heard our ladies in the court of Apollo frequently mention it with lapture, and Cho, who happens to be a little grave, has been heard to prefer it to the Spectator, though others have observed, that the reflections, by being refined, sometimes become minute." This grave gentleman was scaleely seated, when another, whose appearance was something more modern, seemed willing to enter, yet afraid to ask He carried in his hand a bundle of essays, of which the coachman was currous enough to inquire the rhapsodies against the religion of my country." -"And how can you expect to come into my coach, after thus choosing the wrong side of the question?" -" Ay, but I am right," replied the other, "and if you give me leave, I shall, in a few minutes, state the argument "-" Right or wrong," said the coach man, "he who disturbs religion is a blockhead, and he shall never travel in a coach of mine"_"If. then," said the gentleman, mustering up all his courage, "if I am not to have admittance as an essavist, I hope I shall not be repulsed as an historian; the last volume of my history met with applause"-"Yes," replied the coachman, "but I have heard only the first approved at the Temple of Fame, and as I see you have it about you, enter. without farther ceremony." My attention was now diverted to a crowd who were pushing forward a person that seemed more inclined to the Stage-coach of Riches, but by their means he was driven forward to the same machine, which he, however, seemed heartily to despise Impelled, however, by then solicitations, he steps up, flourishing a voluminous history, and demanding admittance "Sir, I have formerly heard your name mentioned," says the coachman, "but never as an historian. Is there no other work upon which you may claim a place?" -"None," replied the other, "except a romance. but this is a work of too trifling a nature to claim future attention "-" You mistake," says the inquisitor, "a well-written romance is no such easy task as is generally imagined. I remember formerly to have carried Cervantes and Segrais; and if you tlank fit, you may enter"

ſΙ

ĸ

[]

ġ

might be the conversation that passed upon this extraordinary occasion, when instead of agreeable or entertaining dialogue, I found them grumbling at each other, and each seemed discontented with his Strange! thought I to myself, that companions they who are thus born to enlighten the world, should still preserve the narrow prejudices of childhood, and, by disagreeing, make even the highest ment udenlous Were the learned and the wise to unite against the dunces of society, instead of sometimes siding into opposite parties with them, they might throw a lustre upon each other's reput ition, and teach every rank of subordinate ment, if not to admine, at least not to avow dislike In the midst of these reflections I perceived the coachman, unmindful of me, had now mounted the Several were approaching to be taken in whose pretensions I was sensible were very just, I therefore desired him to stop, and take in more passenger; but he replied, as he had now mounted the box, it would be improper to come down, but that he should take them all, one after the other, when he should return So he drove away, and for myself, as I could not get in, I mounted behind, in order to hear the conversation on the way,

GOLDSMITTE'S ESSAYS

İΙ

IT.

ON THE INSTABILITY OF WORLDLY GRANDEUR FROM 'THE BEE,' No 6

An alchouse keeper near Islington, who had long lived at the sign of the French King, upon the commencement of the last war with France, pulled down his old sign and put up the Queen of Hungary. Under the influence of her red face and golden sceptre, he continued to sell ale till she was no longer the favourite of his customers, he changed her therefore, some time ago, for the King of Prussia, who may probably be changed in turn for the next great man that shall be set up for vulgar admiration

Our publican in this imitates the great exactly. who deal out their figures, one after the other, to the gazing crowd beneath them When we have sufficiently wondered at one, that is taken in, and another exhibited in its 100m, which seldom holds its station long, for the mob are ever pleased with variety

I must own I have such an indifferent opinion of the vulgar, that I am ever led to suspect that ment which raises then shout; at least I am certain to find those great and sometimes good men, who find satisfaction in such acclamations, made worse by it . and history has too frequently taught me, that the head which has grown this day giddy with the roar of the million has the very next been fixed upon a pole

As Alexander VI was entering a little town in п

m

the neighbourhood of Rome, which had just been evacuated by the enemy, he perceived the townsmen busy in the market-place in pulling down from a gibbet a figure which had been designed to represent himself There were also some knocking down a neighbouring statue of one of the Oisini family, with whom he was at war, in order to put Alexander's effigy, when taken down, in its place It is possible a man who knew less of the world would have condemned the adulation of those barefaced firtherers, but Alexander seemed pleased at then zeal, and, turning to Borgia his son, said with a smile, Vides me file, quam love discremen patibulum enter et statuam -" You see, my son, the small difference between a gibbet and a statue" If the great could be taught any lesson, this might serve to teach them upon how weak a foundation then glory stands, which is built upon popular applause, for as such pines what seems like merit, they as quickly condemn what has only the appearance of gwit

Popular glory is a perfect coquette her lovers must toil, feel every inquietude, indulge every capine, and perhaps at last be jilted into the bargam True glory, on the other hand, resembles a woman of sense her admirers must play no tricks; they feel no great analety, for they are sure in the end of being rewarded in proportion to their ment. When Swift used to appear in public, he generally had the mob shouting in his train "Plague take these fools!" he would say "how much joy night ill this biwling give my Lord Mayor ! "

We have seen those virtues which have, while

n] INSTABILITY OF WORLDLY GRANDEUR II

living, retired from the public eye, generally transmitted to posterity as the truest objects of admiration and piaise. Perhaps the character of the late Duke of Marlborough may one day be set up, even above that of his more talked of piedecessor; since an assemblage of all the mild and amible virtues is far superior to those vulgarly called the great ones. I must be pardoned for this short tribute to the memory of a man who, while living, would as much dotest to receive anything that wore the appearance of flattery, as I should to offer it

I know not how to turn so tate a subject out of the beaten road of commonplace, except by illustrating it rather by the assistance of my memory thon my judgment, and, instead of making reflections, by telling a story.

A Chinese who had long studied the works of Confucius, who knew the characters of fourteen thousand words, and could read a great part of every book that came in his way, once took it into his head to travel into Europe, and observe the customs of a people whom he thought not very much inferior to his own countryman in the arts of refining upon every pleasure Upon his arrival at Amsterdam, his passion for letters naturally led him to a bookseller's shop, and, as he could speak a little Dutch, he civilly asked the bookseller for the works of the immortal Ilixofou The bookseller assured him he had never heard the book mentioned before "What! have you never heard of that immortal poet?" returned the other, much surprised, "that light of the eyes, that favourite of kings, that lose of perfection! I suppose you know nothing of the immortal Fipsishhi, second cousin to the incon?"—"Nothing at all, indeed, sn," returned the other —"Alas!" cries our traveller, "to what purpose, then, has one of these fasted to death, and the other offered himself up as a sacrifice to the Tartarean enemy, to gain a renown which has never travelled beyond the precincts of China!" There is scarcely a village in Europe, and not one university, that is not thus formished with its little great men The head of a petty corporation, who opposes the designs of a prince who would tyrannically force his subjects to save their best clothes for Sundays-the puny pedant who finds one undiscovered property in the polype, describes an unheeded process in the skeleton of a mole, and whose mind, like his microscope, perceives nature only m detail—the rhymer who makes smooth verses, and paints to our imagination when he should speak to our hearts,-all equally fancy themselves walking forward to immortality, and desire the crowd behind them to look on The crowd takes them at their word Patriot, philosopher, and poet are shouted in their train Where was there ever so much merit seen? no times so important as our own! ages yet unboin shall gaze with wonder and applause! To such music the important pigmy moves forward, bustling and swelling, and aptly compared to a puddle in a storm

I have lived to see generals who once had crowds halloong after them wherever they went, who were hep-alsed by newspapers and magazines, those echoes of the voice of the vulgar, and just they have long sunk into mented obscurity, with scarcely even an ſπ epitaph left to flatter. A few years ago the herring fishery employed all Grub Street, it was the topic in every coffee-house, and the burden of every ballad We were to drag up oceans of gold from the bottom of the sea, we were to supply all Europe with herrings upon our own terms. At present we hear no more of all this We have fished up very little gold that I can learn; nor do we furnish the world with herrings as was expected. Let us wait but a few years longer, and we shall find all our expectations an herring fishery

ш.

Custom and Laws Compared From 'The Bre,' No. 7.

What, say some, can give us a more contemptible idea of a large state, than to find it mostly governed by custom, to have few written laws, and no boundaries to mark the jurisdiction between the senate and the people? Among the number who speak in this manner is the great Montesquieu, who asserts that every nation is free in proportion to the number of its written laws, and seems to hint at a despotac and arbitrary conduct in the present King of Prussia, who has abridged the laws of his country into a short compass

As Tactius and Montesquieu happen to differ in sentiment upon a subject of so much importance (for the Roman expressly asserts that the state is generally vicious in proportion to the number of its laws), it will not be aims to examine it a little more minutely, and see whether a strite which, like England, is buildened with a multiplicity of written laws, or which, like Switzerland, Geneva, and some other republics, is governed by custom and the determination of the judge, 13 best.

And to prove the superiority of custom to written law we shall at least find history conspiring Cus tom, or the traditional observance of the practice of their forefathers, was what directed the Romans as well in their public as private determinations Custom was appealed to in pronouncing sentence against a criminal, where part of the formulary was more majorum So Sallust, speaking of the expulsion of Tarquin, says mutate more, and not lege mutata, and Virgil, pacisque imponere moiem So that, in those times of the empire in which the people ietained their liberty, they were governed by custom , when they sank into oppression and tyranny, they were restrained by new laws, and the laws of tradition were abolished As getting the ancients on our side is half a

As getting the ancients on our side is half it victory, it will not be amiss to fortafy the argument with an observation of Chrysostom's "That the enslaved are the fittest to be governed by laws, and free men by eastom" Custom particles of the nature of perental injunction, it is kept by the people themselves and observed with a willing obedence. The observance of it must, therefore, be a mark of free dom, and coming originally to a state from the reverenced founders of its libesty, will be an encouragement and assistance to it in the defence of that blessing but a conquered people, a nation of slaves, must pretend to none of this freedom, or these happy distinctions, having, by degeneracy, tions, their masters will in policy take the forfeiture, and the fixing a conquest must be done by giving laws, which may every moment serve to remind the people enslaved by their conquerors, nothing being more dangerous than to trust a late subdued people with old customs, that presently upbraid their degeneracy, and provoke them to revolt

The wisdom of the Roman republic in their veneration for custom, and backwardness to introduce a new law, was perhaps the cause of their long continuance, and of the virtues of which they have set the world so many examples But to show in what that wisdom consists, it may be proper to observe that the benefit of new written laws is merely confined to the consequences of their observance, but customary laws, keeping up a voneration for the founders, engage men in the imitation of their virtues as well as policy To this may be ascribed the religious regard the Romans paid to their forefathers' memory, and their adhering for so many ages to the practice of the same virtues, which nothing contributed more to effore than the introduction of a voluminous body of new laws over the neck of venerable custom

The simplicity, conciseness, and antiquity of custom give an an of majesty and immutability that include a condition of the voluminous, perplaced, and indeterminate, whence must necessarily arise neglect, contempt, and ignorance

As every human institution is subject to gioss imperfections, so has must necessarily be liable to the same inconveniences, and their defects soon

neports, which may be termed the acts of judges, are every day becoming more voluminous, and loading the subject with new penalties

Laws ever increase in number and severity, until they at length are strained so tight as to break themselves. Such was the case of the latter emprewhose laws were at length become so strict, that barbarous invaders did not bring servitude but liberty.

IV.

An Account of the Augustan Age of England From 'The Bee,' No 8

The history of the rise of language and learning is calculated to gratify currouty rather than to satisfy the understanding. An account of that period only when language and learning arrived at its highest perfection is the most conducive to real improvement, since it at once raises emulation and directs to the proper objects. The age of Leo X in Italy is confessed to be the Augustan age with them the French writers seem agreed to give the same appellation to that of Lous XIV but the English are yet undetermined with respect to themselves.

Some have looked upon the writers in the times of Queen Elizabeth as the true standard for future initiation, others have descended to the leign of James I, and others still lower, to that of Charles II Were I to be permitted to offer an opinion upon this subject, I should readily give my vote for the reign of Queen Anne, or some years before that period. It was then that taste was united to genus, and as before our writers charmed with their strength of thinking, so then they pleased with strength and grace united. In that period of British glory, though no writer attracts our attention singly, yet, like stars lost in each other's brightness, they have cost such a lustre upon the age in which they hved that their minutest trans actions will be attended to by posterity with a greater eagerness than the most important occurrences of even empires which have been transacted in greater obscurity.

At that period there seemed to be a just balance between patronage and the press Before it, men were little esteemed whose only merit was genus, and since, men who can prodonly be content to catch the public, are certain of hving without dependence. But the writers of the period of which I am speaking, were sufficiently esteemed by the great, and not rewarded enough by booksellers to set them above dependence. Fame, consequently, then was the truest road to happiness, a sedulous attention to the mechanical business of the day makes the prevent never-fuling resource.

The age of Chules II, which our countrymen term the age of wit and immorality, produced some writers that at once served to improve our language and courupt our hearts. The king himself had a large share of knowledge and some wit, and his counters were generally men who had been brought up in the school of affection and experience. For this reason, when the sunshine of their fortune returned, they gave too great a loose to pleasure, and language was by their cultivated only as a mode of elegance. Hence it became more enervated, and was

IV] THE AUGUSTAN AGE OF ENGLAND. dashed with quaintnesses, which gave the public writings of those times a very illiberal an. L'Estrange, who was by no means so bad a writer

19

as some have represented him, was sunk in party faction, and having generally the worst side of the argument, often had recourse to scolding, pertness, and, consequently, a vulgarity that discovers itself

even in his more liberal compositions. He was the first writer who regularly enlisted himself under the banners of a party for pay, and fought for it, through night and wrong, for upwards of forty literary campaigns This intrepidity gained him the esteem of Cromwell himself, and the papers he wrote even just before the Revolution, almost with the rope about his neck, have his usual characters of impudence and perseverance. That he was a standard writer cannot be disowned, because a great many very emment authors formed their style by his. But his standard was far from being a just one, though, when party considerations are set aside, he certainly was possessed of elegance, ease, and perspicuity Dryden, though a great and undisputed genius, had the same cast as L'Estrange Even his plays discover him to be a party man, and the same principle infects his style in subjects of the lightest nature, but the English tongue, as it stands at present, is greatly his debtor. He first gave it regular harmony, and discovered its latent powers

It was his pen that formed the Congreves, the Priors, and the Addisons, who succeeded him, and had it not been for Dryden, we never should have known a Pope, at least in the meridian lustre he now displays But Dryden's excellences as a writer were not confined to poetry alone There is in his prose 22

flow spontaneously from inward conviction Barrow,

fiv.

though greatly his superior in learning, falls short of him in other respects The time seems to be at hand when justice will be done to Mr Cowley's prose as well as poetical writings, and though his friend Dr Sprat, Bishop of Rochester, in his diction falls far short of the abilities for which he has been celebrated, yet there is sometimes a happy flow in his periods, something that looks like elequence The style of his successor. Atterbury, has been much commended by his friends, which always happens when a man distinguishes himself in party, but there is in it nothing extraordinary Even the speech which he made for humself at the har of the House of Lords, before he was sent into exile, is word of eloquence, though it has been cried up by his friends to such a degree that his enemies have suffered it to pass uncensured The philosophic manner of Lord Shaftesbury's writing is nearer to that of Cicero than any English author has yet arrived at, but perhaps had Cheero written in English, his composition would have greatly exceeded that of our countryman diction of the latter is beautiful, but such beauty as upon nearer inspection carries with it evident symptoms of affectation This has been attended with very disagreeable consequences. Nothing is so preserving his blemishes, but unhappily not one of his beauties Mr Trenchard and Dr Davenant were political writers of great abilities in diction, and then

easy to copy as affectation, and his Lordship's rank and fame have procured him more imitators in Britain than any other writer I know, all futhfully pamphlets are now standards in that way of writing They were followed by Dean Swift, who, though in other respects far their superior, never could arise to that manliness and clearness of diction in political writing for which they were so justly

IV THE AUGUSTAN AGE OF ENGLAND

famous morals, never

They were all of them exceeded by the late Lord Bolingbroke, whose strength lay in that province, for as a philosopher and a critic he was ill qualified, being destitute of viitue for the one, and of learning for the other. His writings against Sir Robert Walpole are incomparably the best part of his works The personal and perpetual antipathy he had for that family, to whose places he thought his own abilities had a right, gave a glow to his style, and an edge to his manner, that never yet have been equalled in political writing. His misfortunes and disappointments gave his mind a turn which his filends mistook for philosophy, and at one time of his life he had the art to impose the same belief upon some of his enemies. His idea of a patriot king, which I reckon (as indeed it was) amongst his writings against Sir Robert Walpole, is a masterpiece of diction Even in his other works his style is excellent, but where a man either does not or will not understand the subject he writes on. there must always be a deficiency. In politics, he

Mr Addison, for a happy and natural style, will be always an honour to Buitsh literature. His duction, indeed, wants strength, but at is equal to all the subjects he undertakes to handle, as he never (at least in his finished works) attempts any-was generally master of what he undertook; in

thing either in the argumentative or demonstrative way

Though 8n Ruchard Steele's reputation as a public writer was own; to his connections with Mr Addison, is after their intrinsic was formed. Steele sank in his merit as an author. This was not own; so much to the ervicent superiority on the part of Addison, as to the unnatural efforts which Steele made to equal or eclipse from This cardiation destroyed that genume flow of dection which is discoverable in all his former composition.

Whilst their writings engaged attention and the favour of the public, rathented but unsuccessful condeavours were made towards forming a grammat of the English language. The authors of these efforts went upon wrong pareciple. Instead of endeavouring to retreach the absurdates of outlenguage, and bringing it to a certain criterion, their grammats were no other than a collection of rules attempting to naturalize these absurdates, and bring thou under a regular system.

Somewhat effectivel, however, might have been done towards fixing the struderd of the English language, had it not been for the sport of party for both Whyr and Toures being ambitions to stand at the head of so greet a design, the Queen's death happened before any plus of an icademy could be resolved on.

Meanwhile, the necessity of said an institution became every day more apparent. The periodial and political writers, who then summed, adopted the very worst manger of LES trange, till not only all decency, but all propuety, of language was led in the notion. Leslie, a pet writes, with some with and learning, insulted the government every week with the grossest abuse. His style and manner, both of which were illiberal, were imitated by Ridpath, Defoc, Dunton, and others of the opposite party, and Toland pleaded the cause of atheism and immorphity in much the same strain: his subject seemed to debase his distinct, and he ever failed most in one, when he give most licentious in the other Towards the end of Queen Anne's reign some of the greatest men in England devoted their time to party, and then a much better manner obtained in political writing. Mr. Walpole, Mr. Addi-on, Mr. Mainwaring, Mr. Steele, and many members of both houses of Parliament, drew their pens for the Whigs, but they seem to have been overmatched, though not in argument, yet in writing, by Bolingbioke, Phior, Swift, Arbuthnot, and the other friends of the opposite party. They who oppose a ministry have always a better field for indicule and reproof than they who defend it.

IV) THE AUGUSTAN AGE OF ENGLAND

Since that period our writers have either been

Since that period our writers have either been encouraged above their ments or below them. Some who were possessed of the meanest abilities acquired the highest preferments, while others who seemed born to reflect a lustre upon their age perished by want or neglect. More, Savage, and Amherst were possessed of great abilities, yet they were suffered to feel all the miseries that usually attend the ingenious and the impuribent—that attend men of strong passions, and no phlegmate reserve in their command.

At present, were a man to attempt to improve his fortune or increase his friendship by poetry, he would soon itself the anxiety of disappointment. The

piess lies open, and is a benefactor to every sort of literature but that alone

26

I am at a loss whether to ascribe this falling off of the public to a victors taste in the post of in them Perhaps both are to be reprehended The poet, either drily didactic, gives us rules which might appear abstruse even in a system of ethics, or triflingly volatile, writes upon the most unworthy subjects, content, if he can give music instead of sense, contert, if he can paint to the imagination without any desires or endeavours to affect the public, therefore, with justice, discard such empty sound, which has nothing but a jingle, or, what is worse, the unmusical flow of blank verse, to recommend it The late method, also, into which our newspapers have fallen, of giving an epitome of every new publication, must greatly damp the waiter's genius He finds himself, in this case, at the mercy of men who have neither abilities nor learning to distinguish his merit. He finds his own composition mixed with the soided trash of every daily scribble. There is a sufficient specimen given of his work to abate curiosity, and yet so mutilated as to render him contemptible. His first, and perhaps his second, work by these means sink, among the crudities of the age, into oblivion Fame, he finds, begins to turn her back he therefore flies to profit, which invites him, and he eniols himself in the lists of dulness and of avance for life

Yet there are still among us men of the greatest abilities, and who, in some parts of learning, have surpassed then predecessors. Justice and friendship might here impel me to speak of names which will shine out to all posterity, but prudence restrains me from what I should other wise eagerly embrace Envy might rise against every honoured name I should mention, since scarcely one of them has not those who are his enemies, or those who despise him, &c.

٧.

CAROLAN · THE IRISH BARD. MISCELLANEOUS ESSAYS

THERE can be perhaps no greater entertainment than to compare the rude Celtae simplicity with modern refinement Books, however, seem incapable of furnishing the parallel, and to be acquainted with the ancient manners of our own ancestors, we should endeavour to look for their remains in those countries which, being in some measure retired from an intercourse with other nations, are still untinctured with foreign refinement, language, or breeding

The Trish will satisfy curiosity in this respect preferably to all other nations I have seen. They, in several parts of the country, still adhere to their ancient language, dress, furniture, and superstitions, several customs exist among them that still speak their original, and, in some respects, Cascar's description of the ancient Britons is applicable to these

Their bands, in particular, are stall held in great veneration among them, those traditional heislds are invited to every functal, in order to fill up the interval, of the howl with their songs and harps. In these they rehearse the actions of the ancestors of the deceased beward the bondage of their country under the English government, and generally conclude with advising the young men and maders to make the best use of their time, for they will soon, for all their present bloom, be stretched under the table, like the dead body before them

Of all the bards this country ever produced, the last and the greatest was Canolan fell Blind. He was at once a poet, a musician, a composer and sing his own verses to his hup. The original native never mention his name without rapture, both his poetry and music they have by heart, and era some of the English themselves, who have been transplanted there, find his much extremely pleasing A song beginning,

"O'Rourke's noble fare will ne'er be forgot,"

translated by Dean Swift, is of his composition, which, though perhaps by this means the best known of his pieces, is yet by no means the most deserving His songs in general may be compared to those of Pindur, as they have frequently the same flights of imagination, and are composed (I do not say written, for he could not write) merely to flatter some man of fortune upon some excellence of the same kind In these one man is praised for the excellence of his stable, as in Pindar, another for his hospitality, a third for the beauty of his wife and children, and a fourth for the antiquity of his family. Whenever any of the original natives of distinction were assembled at feasting or revelling. Carolan was generally there, where he was always ready with his haip to celebrate their praises He seemed by nature formed for his profession; for as he was born blind, so also he was possessed of a most astonishing memory, and a facetious turn of thinking, which gave his entertainers infinite satisfaction Being once at the house of an hish nobleman, where there was a musician present who was emment in the profession, Carolan immediately challenged him to a trial of skill To carry the jest forward, his lordship persuaded the musician to accept the challerge, and he accordingly played over on his fiddle the fifth concerto of Vivaldi Carolan. immediately taking up his harp, played over the whole piece after him, without missing a note, though he had never heard it before, which produced some surprise, but their astonishment increased, when he assured them he could make a concerto in the same taste himself, which he instantly composed, and that with such spirit and elegance, that it may compare (for we have it still) with the finest compositions of Italy

His death was not less remarkable than his life Homei was never more fond of a glass than he, he would drink whole pints of usquebaugh, and, as he used to think, without any ill consequence. His intemperance, however, in this respect, at length brought on an incurable disorder, and when just at the point of death, he called for a cup of his beloved liquor. Those who were standing round him, surprised at the demand, endeavoured to persuade him to the contrary; but he persisted, and when the bowl was brought to him attempted to drink, but could not, wherefore, giving away the bowl, he observed, with a smile, that it would be hard if two such friends as he and the cup should part at least without kirsing, and then expired.

the deceased, bewail the bondage of their country under the English government, and generally conclude with advising the young men and madens to make the best use of their time, for they will sown, for all their present bloom, be stretched under the table, like the dead body before them

Of all the birds this country ever produced, the last and the greatest was Carolan run Blain. He was at once a poet, a manisam, a compose and sung his own verses to his help. The original natives never mention his name without rapture; both his poetry and music they have by heart, and even some of the English themselves, who have been tanaplanted there, find his music extremely pleasing A rong beginning.

"O'Rourke's noble face will ne'er be forgot,"

translated by Dean Swift, is of his composition, which, though perhaps by this means the best known of his pieces, is yet by no means the most deserving His songs in general may be compared to those of Pindar, as they have frequently the sum? flights of imagination, and are composed (I do not say written, for he could not write) merely to flatter some man of fortune upon some excellence of the same kind. In these one man is maked for the excellence of lus stable, as in Pindar, unother for his hospitality, a ilmd for the beauty of his wife and children, and a fourth for the antiquity of his family Whenever any of the original natives of distruction were assembled at feasting or revelling Carolan was generally there, where he was always realy with his burp to celebrate their praises. He seemed by nature formed for his profession, for as he was born blind, so also he was possessed of a most astonishing memory, and a facetious turn of thinking, which gave his entertainers infinite satisfaction Being once at the house of an Irish nobleman, where there was a musician present who was emment in the profession, Carolan immediately challenged him to a trial of skill To carry the jest forward, his lordship persuaded the musician to scept the challenge, and he accordingly played over on his fiddle the fifth concerto of Vivaldi Carolan, immediately taking up his harp, played over the whole piece after him, without missing a note, though he had never heard it before, which pro duced some surprise, but then astonishment increased, when he assured them he could make a concerto in the same taste himself, which he instantly composed, and that with such spirit and elegance, that it may compare (for we have it still) with the finest compositions of Italy.

finest compositions of Italy.

Ins death was not less remarkable than his life Homei was never more fond of a glass than he, he would druik whole purts of usquebaugh, and, as he used to think, without any ill consequence. His intemperance, however, in this respect, at length brought on an inturable disorder; and when just at the point of death, he called for a cup of his beloved liquor. Those who were standing found him, surprised at the demand, endeavouned to persuade him to the containty, but he persisted, and when the bowl was brought to him attempted to drink, but could not, wherefore, giving away the bowl, he observed, with a smile, that it would be hand if two such firends as he and the cup should part at least without kissing, and then expired.

VT.

NATIONAL CONCORD MISCHLIAM OUS ESSAYS, No 15

I TARE the liberty to communicate to the public of few loose thoughts upon a subject which, though often handled, has not yet in my opinion been fully discussed.—I mean initional concord, or unanimity, which in this kingdom has been generally considered as a bare possibility that existed mowhere but in speculation. Such an union is perhaps mether to be expected nor wished for in a country whose liberty depends rather upon the genus of the people than upon any precautions which they have taken in a constitutional way for the guard and preservation of this mestimable blessing

There is a very honest gentleman with whom I nave been acquainted these thirty years, during which there has not been one speech uttered against the ministry in parliament, nor struggle at an election for a burgess to serve in the House of Commons, nor a pamphlet published in opposition to any measure of the administration, nor even a private censure passed in his hearing upon the misconduct of any person concerned in public affairs, but he is immediately alarmed, and loudly exclaims against ruch fretions doings, in order to set the people by the cars together at such a delicate juncture any other time," says he, "such opposition might not be improper, and I don't question the facts that are alleged, but at this cases, sir, to inflame the nation—the man deserves to be punished as a traiter to his country." In a word, according to this gentle man's opinion, the nation has been in a violent crisis at any time these thirty years, and were it possible for him to live another century, he would never find any period at which a man might with safety impugn the infallibility of a minister

۲r٦

31

The case is no more than this: my honest friend has invested his whole fortune in the stocks, on Government security, and trembles at every whiff of popular discontent Were every British subject of the same tame and timid disposition, Magna Charta would be wholly disregarded by an ambitious prince, and the liberties of England expire without a grean Opposition, when restrained within due bounds, is the salubrious gale that ventilates the opinions of the people, which might otherwise stagnate into the most abject submission. It may be said to purify the atmosphere of politics. to dispel the gioss vapours inised by the influence of ministernal artifice and corruption, until the constitution, like a mighty lock, stands full disclosed to the view of every individual who dwells within the shade of its protection Even when this rale blows with augmented violence, it generally tends to the advantage of the commonwealth it wakes the apprehension, and consequently arouses all the faculties of the pilot at the helm, who redoubles his vigilance and caution, exerts his utmost skill, and, becoming acquainted with the nature of the navigation, in a little time learns to soit his canvis to the loughness of the ser and the tim of the vessel. Without these intervening storms of opposition to exercise his faculties, he would become enervated, negligent, and presumptuous, and in the wantonness of his power, trusting to some decentful calm, perhaps hazard a step that would wreck the constitution Yet there is a measure in all things A moderate frost will fertilise the globe with nitrous particles, and destroy the eggs of permicious insects that prey upon the fancy of the year but if this first increases in severity and duration, it will chill the seeds, and even freeze up the roots of vegetables . it will check the bloom, mp the buds, and blast all the promise of the spring The vernal breeze that drives the fog before it, that brushes the colivebs from the boughs, that fans the air, and fosters vegetation, if augmented to a tempost will strip the leaves, overthrow the ties, and desolate the garden The auspicious gale before which the trim vessel ploughs the bosom of the sea, while the mariners are kept alert in duty and in spirits, if converted into a hurricane, overwhelms the crew with terror and confusion. The sails me ient, the coidage clacked, the masts give way; the master eyes the havee with mute despur, and the vessel founders in the storm Opposition, when confined within its proper channels, sweeps away those beds of soil and banks of sand which corruptive power had gathered, but when it overflows its banks, and deluges the plain, its course is marked by ruin and dovistation The opposition necessary in a free state, like that

The opportion necessary in a free state, like that of Great Britain, is not at all incompatible with that national concord which ought to unite the people on emergencies in which the general safety is at stake it is the jedousy of patriotism, not the rancour of party—the waimth of candour, not the virulence of late—a transcent dispute among friends, not in implacable fend that admits of no reconciliation.

The history of all ages teems with the fatal effects of internal discord, and were history and tradition annihilated, common sense would plainly point out the mischiefs that must arise from want of harmony and national union. Every schoolboy can have recourse to the fable of the rods, which, when united in a bundle, no strength could bend, but when separated into single twigs, a child could break with ease.

VII

ASEM THE MAN-HATER, OR, A VINDICATION OF THE WISDOM OF GOD IN THE MORAL GOVERNMENT OF THE WORLD, AN EASTERN TALE MISCELLANFOUS ESSAYS, NO. 32

WHYRE Tauris lifts its head above the stoim, and presents nothing to the sight of the distant traveller but a prospect of nodding rocks, falling torrents, and all the variety of tremendous nature; on the bleak boson of this frightful mountain, secluded from society, and detesting the ways of men, hved Asem the man-hater

Asem had spent his youth with men, had shared in their amisements, and had been trught to love his fellow-creatures with the most ardent affection, but, from the tenderness of his disposition, he exclusived all his fortune in reheaving the wants of the distressed. The petitionen evers used in vair; the weary triveller never pissed his door, he only desisted from doing good when he had no longer the power of reheaving.

For a fortune thus spent in benevolence he exneheved, and made his application with confidence of redress, the ungrateful would soon graw weary of his importantly, for pity is but a short lived passion. He soon, therefore, began to view mankind in a very different light from that in which he had before beheld them, he perceived a thousand vices he had never before suspected to exist, wherever he turned, negratitude, dissimulation, and treachery contailuated to meacuse his detestation of them. Resolved, therefore, to continue no longer in a would which he hated, and which reprid his detestation with contempt, he retried to this region of sternity, in order to brood over his resentment in solitade, and converse with the only honest heart he knew—namely, with his own

A cave was his only shelter from the inclemency of the weather, finits, gathered with difficulty from the mountain's side, his only food, and his dunk was fetched, with danger and tool, from the headlong torrent. In this manner he lived, sequestered from society, passing the hours in meditation, and sometimes exulting that he was able to live independent of his fellow-creatures.

At the foot of the mountain an extensive lake displayed its glassy becom, reflecting on its broad surface the impending horiors of the mountain. To this capacious mirror he would sometimes descend, and, redining on its steep banks, cast an eager look on the amouth expanse that lay before him. "How becuriful," he often cried, "is Nature! How lovely even in her wildest scenes! How finely contrasted is the level plu that hes beneath me with you wiful pile that hides its tremndous head in clouds! But the beauty of these scenes is no way comparable with their utility, hence an hundred rivers are supplied, which distribute health and verdure to the various countries through which they flow. Every part of the universe is beautiful, just, and wise; but man, vile man, is a solecism in Nature, the only monster in the creation. Tempests and whinking have their use; but vicious, ungrateful man is a blot in the fair page of universal beauty. Why was I born of that detested species, whose vices are almost a reproach to the wisdom of the divine Creator? Were men entirely free from vice, all would be unformity, haimony, and order. A world of monal rectitude should be the result of a porfect monal agent. Why, why then, O. Alla! must I be thus confined in dalkness, doubt, and despars?"

Just as he uttered the word despair, he was going to plunge into the lake beneath him, at once to satisfy his doubts, and put a period to his anxiety, when he perceived a most majestic being walking on the surface of the water, and approaching the bank on which he stood. So unexpected an object at once checked his purpose, he stopped, contemplated, and fancied he saw something awful and divine in his aspect.

"Son of Adam," ened the Genius, "stop thy rash purpose, the Father of the Fathful has seen thy justice, thy integrity, thy miseries, and hath sent me to afford and administer relief. Give me think lead, and follow without trembling wherever I shall lead, in me behold the Genius of Conviction, kept by the great Prophet, to turn from their entors those who go astray, not from curiosity, but a rectatude of intention. Follow me and be wise."

Asem immediately descended upon the lake and his guide conducted him along the surface of the water, till, coming near the centre of the lake, they both began to sink, the waters closed over their heads; they descended several hundred fathoms, till Asem, just ready to give up his life as inovitably lost, found himself, with his celestial guide, in another world, at the bottom of the waters, where human foot had never trod before — His astonishment was beyond description, when he saw a sun like that he had left, a serene sky over his head, and blooming veidure under his feet.

"I plainly perceive your amazement," said the Genius, "but suspend it for a while This world was formed by Alla, at the request, and under the inspection of our great Prophet, who once entertained the same doubts which filled your mind when I found you, and from the consequence of which you were so lately rescued The rational inhabitants of this world are formed agreeable to your own ideas, they are absolutely without vice. In other respects it resembles your earth, but differs from it in being wholly inhabited by men who never do wrong If you find this world more agreeable than that you so lately left, you have free permission to spend the remainder of your days in it, but permit me for some time to attend you, that I may silence you. doubts, and make you better acquainted with your company and your new habitation."

"A world without vice! Rational beings without immorality!" cared Asem, in 1 apture, "I think thee, O Alla! who hast at length head my petitions, this, this indeed will produce happiness, ecstary, and ease Oh, for an immortality, to spend it among men who are incapable of ingratitude, injustice, fraud, violence, and a thousand other crimes that render Society miserable!"

"Cease thme exclamations," replied the Gemins
"Look around thee; reflect on every object and action before us, and communicate to me the result of time observations. Lead wherever you think proper, I shall be your attendant and instructor." Asem and his companion travelled on in silence for some time, the former being entirely lost in astomishment, but at last recovering his former seremity, ho could not help observing, that the face of the cumulay bore a near resemblance to that he had left, except that this subterranean world still seemed to retain its princeval wildness

"Here," cried Asem, "I perceive animals of prey and others that seem only designed for their subsistence, it is the very same in the world over our heads But had I been permitted to instruct our Prophet, I would have removed this defect, and formed no voracious or destructive animals, which only prey on the other parts of the creation "--"Your tenderness for inferior animals is, I find. remarkable," said the Genius, smiling "But, with regard to meaner creatures, this world exactly resembles the other, and, indeed, for obvious icasons, for the earth can support a more considerable num ber of animals by their thus becoming food for each other, than if they had lived entirely on her vegetable productions. So that animals of different natures thus formed, instead of lessening their multitude, subsist in the greatest number possible But let us hasten on to the inhabited country before us, and see what that offers for instruction "

They soon gained the utmost verge of the forest, and entered the country inhibited by men without vice, and Asem anticipated in idea the lational delight he hoped to experience in such an innocent Scenety But they had senicely left the confines of the wood, when they beheld one of the inhabitants flying with hasty steps, and terior in his counte nance, from an army of squirrels, that closely pur-"Heavens!" cried Asem, "why does he sued him fly? What can be fear from animals so contemptable?" He had scarcely spoken, when he perceived two dogs pursuing another of the human species, who with equal terror and haste attempted to avoid them "This," cried Asem to his guide, "is truly surprising, not can I conceive the reason for so strange an action "-" Every species of animals," replied the Genius, "has of late grown very powerful in this country, for the inhabitants, at first, thinking it unjust to use either fraud or force in destroying them, they have insensibly increased, and now frequently ravage then harmless frontiers"

"But they should have been destroyed," cried Asem, "you see the consequence of such neglect" -"Where is, then, that tenderness you so lately expressed for subordinate animals?" replied the Genius, smiling, "you seem to have forgot that branch of justice "-" I must acknowledge my mistake," leturned Asem, "I um now convinced that we must be guilty of tyr many and injustice to the hate destion, if we would enjoy the world ourselves But let us no longer observe the duty of man to these mational creatures, but survey their connections with one another"

As they walked farther up the country, the more he was surprised to see no vestiges of handsome vii 1

39

houses, no cities, or any mark of elegant design. His conductor, perceiving his surprise, observed, that the inhabitants of this new world were perfectly content with their ancient simplicity; each had a house, which, though homely, was sufficient to lodge his little family, they were too good to build houses, which could only increase their own pride, and the envy of the spectators, what they built was for convenience, and not for show "At least, then," sud Asem, "they have neither architects, painters, nor statuaries in their society, but these are idle arts, and may be spared However, before I spend much more time here, you should have my thanks for introducing me into the society of some of their wisest men, there is scarce any pleasure to me equal to a refined conversation, there is nothing of which I am so much enamoured as wisdom."-"Wisdom!" replied his instructor, "how ridiculous! We have no wisdom here, for we have no occasion for it, true wisdom is only a knowledge of our own duty, and the duty of others to us, but of what use is such wisdom here? Each intuitively performs what is right in himself, and expects the same from others If by wisdom you should mean vain curiosity and empty speculation, as such pleasures have their origin in vanity, luxury, or avarice, we are too good to pursue them "-"All this may be right," says Asem, "but methinks I observe a solitary disposition prevail among the people, each family keeps separately within their own precincts, without society, or without intercourse "-"That indeed is true," replied the other, "here is no established society not should there be any, all societies are made either through fear or friendship, the people we are among are too good to fean each other, and there are no notaves to private friendship, where all are equally mentorious "--" Well, then," and the sceptice, "as I am to spend my time here, if I am to have neither the polite aris, nor wisdom, nor friendship, in such a world, I should be glad at least of an easy companion, who may tell me his thoughts, and to whom I may communicate mine "--" And to what purpose should either do this?" says the Genius, "flattery or currosity are vicious motives, and never allowed of here, and wisdom is out of the question."

"Still, however," said Asem, "the inhabitants must be happy, each is contented with his own possessions, nor avariciously endeavours to heap up more than is necessary for his own subsistence, each has therefore lessure for pitying those that sland in need of his compassion " He had scarce spoken, when his ears were assaulted with the lamentations of a wietch who sat by the way-side, and in the most deplorable distress seemed gently to murmur at his own misery. Asem immediately ran to his rehef, and found him in the last stage of a consumption. "Strange," cried the son of Adam, "that men who are free from vice should thus suffer so much misery without relief!"-"Be not surprised," said the wretch who was dying, "would it not be the utmost unjustice for beings who have only just sufficient to support themselves, and are content with a bure subsistence, to take it from their own mouths to put it into mine? They never are possessed of a single meal more than is necessary, and what is birely necessary cannot be dispensed with "-"They should have been supplied with more than is necessary," cried Asem-"and yet I VII.

contradict my own opinion but a moment before -all is doubt, perplexity, and confusion. Even the want of ingintitude is no virtue here, since they never received a favour They have, however, another excellence yet behind, the love of their country is still, I hope, one of their dailing virtues" -"Peace, Asem," replied the Guardian, with a countenance not less severe than beautiful, "nor forfest all thy pretensions to wisdom, the same selfish motives by which we piefer our own interests to that of others, induce us to regard our country preferably to that of another Nothing less than universal benevolence is free from vice, and that you see is practised here,"-" Strange!" cries the disappointed pilgiim, in an agony of distress, "what sort of a world am I now introduced to? There is scarce a single virtue, but that of temperance, which they practise, and in that they are no way superior to the very brute creation There is scarce an amusement which they enjoy, fortitude, liberality, friendship, wisdom, conversation, and love of country, all are virtues entuely unknown here, thus it seems that to be unacquainted with vice is not to know virtue. Take me, O my Genius! back to that very world which I have despised, a world which has Alla for its contriver is much more wisely formed than that which has been projected by Mahomet Ingratitude, contempt, and hatred I can now suffer, for perhaps I have deserved them When I arraigned the wisdom of Piovidence, I only showed my own ignorance, henceforth let me keep from vice myself, and pity it in others"

He had scatce ended, when the Genius, assuming an air of terrible complacency, called all his thunders around him, and vanished in a whirlwind Asem, astonished at the terror of the cene, looked for his imaginary world; when, casting his eyes around, he perceived himself in the very situation, and in the very place, where he first began to repine and despair, his right foot had been just advanced to take the futal plunge, nor had it been yet withdrawn , so unstruttly did Providence stalke the seares of truths just imprinted on his soul. He now departed from the water side in tranquillity, and, leaving his horiid mansion, travelled to Segest in, his native city, where he diligently applied himself to commerce, and put in practice that wisdom he had learned in solitude. The fingality of a few years soon produced opulence, the number of his domestics increased, his friends came to him from every part of the city, nor d d he receive them with disdain, and a youth of misery was concluded with an old age of elegance, affluence, and ease

VIII

On the Origin of Poetry Miscellaneous Essays, No. 19

The study of polite literature is generally supposed to include all the liberal acts of poetry, painting, sculpture, music, eloquence, and architecture. All these are founded on imitation, and all of them mutually assist and illustrate each other. But as painting, sculpture, music, and architecture cannot be perfectly attained without long practice of manual operation, we shall distinguish them from poetry and eloquence, which depend entirely on the faculties of the mind, and on these last, as on the arts which immediately constitute the Belles Letties, employ our attention in the present inquiry, or, if it should run to a greater length than we propose, it shall be confined to poetry alone; a subject that comprehends in its full extent the province of taste, or what is called polite literature, and differs essentially from eloquence, both in its end and origin.

Poetry sprame from ease, and was consecrated to

43

Poetry sprang from ease, and was consecrated to pleasure: whereas eloquence arose from necessity, and aims at conviction. When we say poetry sprang from ease, perhaps we ought to except that species of it which owed its rise to inspiration and enthusiasm, and properly belonged to the culture of religion. In the first ages of mankind, and even in the original state of Nature, the unlettered mind must have been struck with subline conceptions, with admiration and awe, by those great phenomena which. though every day repeated, can never be viewed without internal emotion. Those would break forth in exclamations expressive of the passion produced. whether surprise or gratitude, terror or exultation. The rising, the apparent course, the setting, and seeming renovation of the sun, the revolution of light and darkness, the splendour, change, and circuit of the moon, and the canopy of heaven bespangled with stars, must have produced expressions of wonder and adoration "O glorious luminary great eye of the world ! source of that light which guides my steps! of that heat which warms me when chilled with cold! of that influence which cheers the face of Nature! whither dost thou retire every evening with the shade? Whence dost thou spring every morning with renovated lustic and never-fading glory? Art not thou the ruler, the creator, the god of all that I behold? I adore thee, as thy child, thy slave, thy supplient! I crave thy protection, and the continuance of the goodness! Leave me not to petish with cold, or to wunder solitary in utter darkness! Return, return, after thy nonted absence; duye before thee the glooms clouds that would obscure the face of Nature. The birds begin to wuble, and every animal is filled with gladness at thy approach, even the trees, the horbs. and the flowers seem to recover with fresher beinties, and send forth a grateful incense to thy power, whence their origin is derived !" A number of individuals, inspired with the same ideas, would join in these orisons, which would be accompanied with corresponding pesticulations of the body. They would be improved by practice, and grow regular from repetition. The sounds and gestures would naturally fall into measured cadence. Thus the song and dance would be produced, and, a system of worship being formed, the muse would be consecrated to the purposes of religion Hence those forms of thanksgivings and hinnes

Hence those forms of thanks grangs and hames of supplication with which the religious rites of all mations, even the most bribarous, are at this day celebrated in every quarter of the known would. In deed, this is a circumstance in which all nations surprisingly agree how much soever they may differ in every other article of laws, customs, manners, and religion. The ancient Egyptians celebrated the festatistic of their gold Apis with hymns and dances. The superstation of the Greeks, partly derived from the Egyptians, abounded with poetracl cenemonies, such as churues and hymns, sung and danced at their apotheoses, sacrifices, games, and divinations. The

45

Romans had their Carmen Seculare and Sahan priests, who on certain festivals sung and danced through the streets of Rome The Israelites were famous for this kind of exultation. "And Miriam, the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand, and all the women went out after her, with timbrels and with dances, and Miriam answered them, Sing ye to the Lord," &c -"And David danced before the Lord with all his might" The psalms composed by this monaich, the songs of Deborah and Isaiah, are further confirmations of what we have advanced

From the Phoenicians the Greeks borrowed the cursed Orthyan song, when they sacrificed their children to Diana The poetry of the baids constituted great part of the religious ceremomes among the Gauls and Britons; and the carousals of the Goths were religious institutions, celebrated with songs of triumph The Mahometan Dervise dances to the sound of the flute, and whirls himself round until he grows giddy, and falls into a trance The Marabous compose hymns in plaise of Alla The Chinese celebrate their grand festivals with processions of idols, songs, and instrumental music The Tartars, Samoiedes, Laplanders, Negroes, even the Caffres called Hottentots, solemnise their worship (such as it is) with songs and dancing, so that we may venture to say poetry is the universal vehicle in which all nations have expressed their most sublime conceptions

Poetry was, in all appearance, previous to any concerted plan of worship, and to every established system of legislation When certain individuals, by dint of superior prowess or understanding, had acquired the veneration of their fellow savages, and erected themselves into divinities on the ignorance and superstition of mankind, then mythology took place, and such a swarm of denties arose, as produced a religion replete with the most shocking about dities Those whom their superior talents had deified were found to be still actuated by the most brutal passions of human nature, and, in all probability, their votaries were glad to find such examples to countenance their own vicious inclinations Thus the most unrestrained sensuchty and heentiousness were sanctified by the amours of Jupiter, Pan, Mars, Venus, and Apollo Theft was patronised by Mercury, drunkenness by Bacchus, and cruelty by Diana The same heroes and legislators, those who delivered their country, founded cities, established societies, invented useful aits, or contributed in any eminent degree to the security and happiness of their fellow-creatures, were inspired by the same lusts and appetites which domineered among the inferior classes of mankind, therefore every vice incident to human nature was celebrated in the worship of one or other of these divinities, and every infirmity consecrated by public feast and solemn sacrifice In these institutions the poet bore a principal share It was his genius that contrived the plan, that executed the form of worship, and recorded in verse the origin and adventures of their gods and demi-gods Hence the impurities and horrors of certain writers, the groves of Paphos and Baal-Peor , the orgies of Bacchus , the human sacrifices to Moloch and Diana Hence the theogony of Hesiod, the theology of Homer, and those innumerable maxims scattered through the ancient poets, inviting mankind to gratify their sensual appetites, in initiation of the gods, who were certainly the best judges of happiness

VIII ]

47

It is well known that Plato expelled Homer from his Commonwealth on account of the infamous characters by which he has distinguished his deities, as well as for some depraved sentiments which he found diffused through the course of the Ihad and Odyssey Cicero enters into the spirit of Plato, and exclaims, in his first book De Natura Deorum .- "Nec multo absurdiora sunt ca quæ, poetarum vocibus fusa, ipsa suavitate nocuerunt qui et ira inflammatos et libidine furentes induverunt Deos, feceruntque ut eorum bella, pugnas, prælia, vulnera videremus, odia praeterea, dissidia, discordias, ortus, interitus, querelas, lamentationes, effusas in omni intemperantià libidines, adulteria, vincula, cum humano genere concubitus, mortalesque ex immortali procreatos "-" Nor are those things much more absurd which, flowing from the poet's tongue, have done mischief even by the sweetness of his expression The poets have introduced gods inflamed with anger and enlaged with lust, and even produced before our eyes their wars, their wrangling, their duels, and their wounds They have exposed, besides, their antipathies, animosities, and dissensions, their origin and death, their complaints and lamentations, their appetites indulged to all manner of excess, their adulteries, their fetters, their amorous commerce with the human species, and from immortal parents derived a mortal offspring " As the festivals of the gods necessarily produced good cheer, which often carried to riot and debauchery, muth of consequence prevailed, and this was always attended with buffoonery Taunts and jokes, and iaillery and repartee, would necessarily ensue; and individuals would contend for the victory in wit and genius. These contests would in time be reduced to some regulations for the entertainment of the people thus assembled, and some pure would be decreed to him who was judged to excel his rivals. The candidates for fame and profit being thus stimulated, would task their talents, and naturally recommend these alternate recriminations to the audience by clothing them with a kind of poetical measure, which should bear a near re-em blance to mose Thus, as the solemn service of the day was composed in the most sublime species of poetry, such as the ode or hymn, the subsequent altercation was carried on in lambics, and gave rise to saure We are told by the Stagirite, that the highest species of poetry was employed in celebrating great actions, but the humbler sort used in this kind of contention, and that in the ages of antiquity there were some bard, that professed heroics, and come that pretended to rambies only.

"Or ner howings, of de lander -om-al"

To these rude beginnings we not only owe the buth of satire, but likewise the origin of dramatic poetry Tragedy herself, which afterwards attained to such dignity as to rival the epic muse, was at first no other than a trial of erambe, or nambes, between two persants, and a goat was the prize, as Herace calls it, vile certamen ob hircum, "a mean contest for a he-goat." Hence the name τραγωδία, signifying the goot-song, from toayos hercus, and ώδή, carmen

"Carmine qui tragico vilem certavit ob hircum, Ctrainine qui tinggio vinini ettavis da intrum, livo ettam agrestes satyros mudvut, et asper Incolum gravitate jocura tentavit co, quod Illecebre esat et grata novitate morandus Speciator, functusque suna, et potus et exter " HORAGE. "The tragic bord, a goat his humble prize, Bade satyrs naked and uncouth ause: His muse severe, secure and undismay'd. The rustic loke in solemn strain convey'd; For novelty alone he knew could chaim

A lawless crowd, with wine and feasting warm "

Satire, then, was originally a clownish dialogue in loose iambics, so called because the actors were disguised like satyrs, who not only recited the praises of Bacchus, or some other deity, but interspersed their hymns with saicastic jokes and altercation. Of this kind is the Cyclops of Euripides, in which Ulysses is the principal actor The Romans also had their Atellane, or interludes, of the same nature, so called from the city of Atella, where they were first acted; but these were highly polished in comparison of the original entertainment, which was altogether rude and innocent. Indeed the Cyclops itself, though composed by the accomplished Euripides, abounds with such impurity as ought not to appear on the stage of any civilised nation

It is very remarkable that the Atellana, which were in effect tragi-comedies, grow into such esteem among the Romans, that the performers in these pieces enjoyed several privileges which were refused to the ordinary actors They were not obliged to unmask, like the other player, when their action was disagreeable to the audience. They were admitted into the army, and enjoyed the privileges of free citizens, without incurring that disgrace which was affived to the characters of other actors poet Laberius, who was of equestrian order, being pressed by Julius Casar to act a part in his own performance, complied with great reluctance, and complained of the disbonour he had incurred in his

prologue, preserved by Macrobius, which is one of the most elegant morsels of antiquity

Tragedy and comedy flowed from the same fountain, though their streums were soon divided. The same entertainment which, under the name of tragedy, was rudely exhibited by clowns, for the prize of a goat, near some awal altra of Baccinus, assumed the appellation of comedy when it was transferred into others, and represented with a little more decours in a cart or waggen that sholled from shock to shoot, as the name κωμωδία implies, being derived from κώμη, a street, and ωδή, a poem. To the origin Horace alludes in these lines.

"Dustur et plaustus verisse poemata Thespis, Qu'e concrent agerentque peruncia fecibles ora."

"The pis, inventor of dramatic art,
Convey'd his vac; intactors in a cast
High o'er the crowd the mamic tribe appear'd,
And blaved and suae, with less of wide besider'd."

The spis is called the inventor of the dramatic art because he caused the subject from clownish alteration to the character and exploits of some heromatic of the improved the language and versification, and relieved the chorus by the calogue of two actors. This was the first advance towards that consummation of genus and art which constitutes what is now cilled a perfect tagedy. The next great improvements are supplied to the constitute of
"Post hunc persona pallaque repertor honeste

"Po bylus, et modicis metravit pulpita tignis, ht cocurt magnumque loqui nitique cothurno"

"Then Æschylus a decent yızard uşed, Built i low stage, the flowing iole defined In language more sublime the seters rage, And in the graceful buskin tread the stage," VIII ]

51

The dialogue which Thespis introduced was called the Episode, because it was an addition to the former subject, namely, the praises of Bacchus, so that now tragedy consisted of two distinct parts. independent of each other; the old recitative, which was the chorus, sung in honour of the gods, and the consode, which turned upon the adventures of some hero. This episode being found very agreeable to the people, Æschylus, who hved about half a century after Thespis, still improved the drama, united the chorus to the episode, so as to make them both parts or members of one fable, multiplied the actors, contrived the stage, and introduced the decorations of the theatre; so that Sophocles, who succeeded Æschylus, had but one step to surmount in order to bring the drama to perfection. Thus tragedy was gradually detached from its original institution, which was entirely religious The priests of Bacchus loudly complained of this innovation by means of the episode, which was foreign to the intention of the chorus, and hence arose the proverb of Nahal ad Dionysum. "Nothing to the purpose" Plutaich himself montions the episode as a perversion of tragedy from the honour of the gods to the passions of men But notwithstanding all opposition, the new tragedy succeeded to admiration, because it was found the most pleasing vehicle of conveying moral truths, of meliorating the heart, and extending the interests of humanity

Comedy, according to Aisstotle, is the younger sister of Tragedy As the first originally turned upon the praises of the gods, the latter dwelt on the follies and vices of mankind Such, we mean, was the scope of that species of poetry which acquired the name of comedy, in contradiction to the targic muse, for in the beginning they were the same. The foundation upon which comedy was built we have already explained to be the practice of satureal repartee or altereation, in which individuals exposed the folles and finalities of each other on public occasions of worship and festivity

The first regular plan of comedy is said to have been the Margites of Homei, exposing the idleness and folly of a worthless character, but of this performance we have no remains. That division which is termed the Ancient Comedy belongs to the labours of Eupolis, Cratinus, and Austophanes, who were contemporaries, and flourished at Athens about tour hundred and thuty years before the Christian cra Such was the license of the muse at this period, that, far from lashing vice in general characters, she boldly exhibited the exact postsait of every individual who had rendered himself remarkable or notorious by his erimes, folly, or debruchery She assumed every circumstance of his external appearance, his very attire, air, manner, and even his name, according to the observation of Horace.

Porte

. . . . quorum contacdia prisca virorum cet, Si quis erré dignus describi, qued malus, ant fur, Qued mechus foret, ant sicarus, aut alioqui Famosus, multa cum libertato notabant "

&quot;The come poets, in its carinst age,
Who form'd the manners of the Greenan stage—
Was there a villium who might justly claim
A better night of being dama'd to fame,
Rake, cut threat, thisf, whatever was his crime,
They boldly signatived the wretch in hyme "

Eupolis is said to have satirised Alcibiades in this manner, and to have fallen a storifice to the resentment of that powerful Athenian but others say he was drowned in the Hellespont, during a war against the Lacedemonians, and that in consequence of this accident the Athenians passed a decree that no poet should ever bear aims. The comedies of Cratinus are recommended by

Quintilian for their elequence, and Plutarch tells us, that even Pericles himself could not escape the censure of this poet Austophanes, of whom there are eleven comedies still extant, enjoyed such a pre-eminence of reputation, that the Athenians, by a public decree, honoured him with a crown made of a consecrated olive tree, which grew in the citadel, for his care and success in detecting and exposing the vices of those who governed the commonwealth Yet this poet, whether impelled by mere wantonness of genius, or actuated by malice and envy, could not refigin from employing the shafts of his ridicule against Sociates, the most venerable character of Pagan antiquity In the comedy of 'The Clouds' this virtuous philosopher was exhibited on the stage, under his own name, in a cloak exactly resembling that which Socrates were, in a mask modelled from his features, disputing publicly on the nature of night and wrong This was undoubtedly an instance of the most flagrant licentiousness; and what renders it the more extraordinary, the audience received it with great applause, even while Sociates himself sat publicly in the theatre. The truth is. the Athenians were so fond of ridicule, that they relished it even when employed against the gods themselves, some of whose characters were vory roughly handled by Aristophanes and his rivals in reputation

We might here driw a parallel between the inhabitants of Athens and the natives of England in point of constitution, genus, and disposition. Athens was a free state like England, that proved itself upon the influence of the democracy Like England, its wealth and disength depended upon its maintaine power, and it generally acted as umpite in the disputes that arose among its neighbours. The people of Athens, like those of England, were remarkably ingenious, and made great progress in the arts and science. They excelled in poetry, history, philosophy, mechanics, and manufacture, they were acute descerning, disputations, fickle, wavering, rash, and combustible, and, above all other nations in Europe, addicted to ridicule, a character which the English inherit in a very remarkable degree

If we may judge from the writings of Aristophanes, his chief aim was to gratify the spleen and excite the mith of his audience, of an indience, too, that the mith of his audience, of an indience, too, that would seem to have been uninformed by taste, and altogeshei ignorant of decorum, for his pieces are replete with the most extravigant absundities, virgient slander, impety, impurities, and low buffoonery. The come muse, not contented with being allowed to make free with the gods and philosophers, applied her scourge os severely to the mynistrates of the commonwealth, that it was thought proper to restrain her within bounds by a law, enacting, that no person should be stigmatised under his real unine, and thus the chorus was silouced. In order to elude the penalty of this law, and gratify the taste of the people, the poets began to substitute fictitious names, under which they exhibited particular characters in such lively colours, that the iesemblance could not possibly be mistaken or overlooked. This practice gave rise to what is called the Middle Comedy, which was but of short duration; for the legislature, perceiving that the first law had not removed the grievance against which it was provided, issued a second ordinance, forbidding, under severe penalties, any real or family occurtences to be represented. This restriction was the namedrate cause of improving comedy into a general muioi, held forth to reflect the various follies and forbles incident to human nature, a species of writing called the New Comedy, introduced by Diphilus and Menander, of whose works nothing but a few fragments remain

f.xi

IX.

POLTRY DISTINGUISHED FROM OTHER WRITING MISCELLANEOUS ESSAYS, No. 20

Having communicated our sentiments touching the origin of poetry, by tracing tragedy and comedy to their common source, we shall now endeavour to point out the criteria by which poetry is distinguished from every other species of writing. In common with other arts, such as statuary and printing, it comprehends imitation, invention, composition, and enthusiasm. Imitation is indeed the basis of all the liberal arts, invention and enthusiasm.

56

constitute genius, in whatever manner it may be displayed Eloquence of all soits admits of enthusiasm Tully says an orator should be "vehernens ut procella, excitatus ut toriens, incensus ut fulmen. tonat, fulgurat, et rapidis eloquentiæ fluctibus cuncta proruit et proturbat"-"Violent is a tempest, imnetuous as a torrent, and glowing intense like the sed bolt of heaven, he thunders, lightens, overthrows, and bears down all before him, by the irresistable tide of eloquence" This is the mens divinior at que os mama sonaturum of Horace This is the talent.

Meunt qui pectus mainter angit, Irritat, mulcet, falsis terroribus implet, Ut magus "

"With passions not my own who fires my heart Who with unreal terrors fills my breast, As rith a magic influence possess'd."

We are told that Michael Angelo Buonaroti used to work at his statues in a fit of enthusiasm, during which he made the fragments of the stone fly about him with surprising violence The celebrated Lully being one day blamed for setting nothing to music but the languad verses of Quinault, was animated with the reproach, and running in a fit of enthusiasm to his harpsichord, sung in recitative and accompanied four pathetic lines from the Iphigenia of Racine, with such expression as filled the hearers with astonishment and horror

Though versification be one of the criteria that distinguish poetry from prose, yet it is not the sole mark of distinction Were the histories of Polybius and Livy simply turned into verse, they would not become poems, because they would be destitute of those figures, embellishments, and flights of imagiIX.

57

nation, which display the poet's art and invention. On the other hand, we have many productions that justly lay claim to the title of poetry, without having the advantage of versification; witness the Psalms of David, the Song of Solomon, with many beautiful hymns, descriptions, and thapsodies, to be found in different parts of the Old Testament, some of them the immediate production of divine inspiration; witness the Celtic fragments which have lately appeared in the English Language, and are centainly replete with poetical merit. But though good versification alone will not constitute poetry, bad versification alone will certainly degrade and 1ender disgustful the sublimest sentiments and finest flowers of imagination This humiliating power of bad verse appears in many translations of the ancient poets, in Ogilby's Homer, Trapp's Virgil, and frequently in Creech's Horace This last indeed is not wholly devoid of spirit, but it seldom rises above mediocrity, and, as Horace says,

Non homines, non Di, non concessere columna."

"But God and man, and letter'd post denies, That Poets ever are of middling size."

How is that beautiful ode beginning with Justim et tenacem proposits virum chilled and tuned by the following translation:

"He who by principle is sway'd,
In truth and justice still the same,
Is nother of the crowd afraid,
Though each broils the state inflame;
Nor to a haughity tyrant's from a will stoop,
Nor to a reging storm, when all the winds troup.

constitute genius, in whatever manner it may be displayed Eloquence of all sorts admits of enthusiasm Tully says an orator should be "vehemens ut procella, excitatus ut toriens, incensus ut fulmen tonat, fulgurat, et 12 pidis eloquentiæ fluctibus cuncta proruit et proturbat"-"Violent as a tempest, impetuous as a torient, and glowing intense like the red bolt of heaven, he thunders, lightens, overthrows, and bears down all before him, by the mesistible tide of eloquence" This is the mens divinior atque os magar sonaturum of Horace This is the talent,

Moum qui pectus maintar angit, Irritat, mulect, falsis terroribus implet, Ut magus "

"With passions not my own who fites my heart Who with unreal terrors fills my breast, As with a magic influence possess'd."

We are told that Michael Angelo Buonaroti used to work at his statues in a fit of enthusiasm, during which he made the fragments of the stone fly about him with surprising violence. The celebrated Lully being one day blamed for setting nothing to music but the languid verses of Quinault, was animated with the reproach, and running in a fit of enthusiasm to his harpsichord, sung in recitative and accompanied four pathetic lines from the Iphigenia of Racine, with such expression as filled the hearers with astronshment and horror.

Though versification be one of the criteria that distinguish poetry from plose, yet it is not the sole mark of distinction Were the histories of Polybius and Lavy simply turned into verse, they would not become poems, because they would be destribute of those figures, embellishments, and flights of imagi1x.7

57

nation, which display the poet's art and invention. On the other hand, we have many productions that justly lay claim to the tatle of poetry, without having the advantage of versification, witness the Psalms of David, the Song of Solomon, with many beautiful hymns, descriptions, and shapsodies, to be found in different parts of the Old Testament, some of them the immediate production of divine inspilation; witness the Celtic fragments which have lately appeared in the English language, and are certainly replete with poetical merit. But though good versification alone will not constitute poetry, bad versification alone will certainly degrade and lender disgustful the sublimest sentiments and finest flowers of imagination This humiliating power of bad verse appears in many translations of the ancient poets, in Ogilby's Homer, Trapp's Virgil, and frequently in Creech's Horace. This last indeed is not wholly devoid of spirit, but it seldom rises above mediocrity, and, as Horace says,

Non homines, non Di, non concessere columnæ."

"But God and man, and letter'd post denies, That Poets over are of middling size"

How is that beautiful ode beginning with Justum et tenacem propositi virum chilled and tained by the following translation:

"He who by principle is way'd,
In truth and justice still the same,
I mether of the crowd afraid,
Though und broads the state inflame,
Nor to a haught; tymut's frown will stoop,
Nor to a ryging storm, when all the winds are up.

Should nature with convulsions shake, Struck with the nery bolts of Jove, The final doom and dreadful cruk Cumot his constant courage move,"

This long Alexandrine—"Not to a raging storm, when all the winds are up," is drawling, feeble, with with a pleonasm or tantology, as well as deficient in the thyme, and as for the "draudful crack," in the next stanza, instead of exorting terror, it conveys a low and ludenous idea. How much more olegant and energetic is this paraphrase of the same ode, inserted in one of the volumes of Hume's History of England.

"The man whose mead, on virtue bent, Pursues some greatly good intent With undiverted aim, Serune beholds the engry crowd, Not can their chapters herce and loud His stubborn herous targe

"Not the groud tyrant's fierdest thing it, Not storms that from their dark retreat. The laveless surges wake, Nor Joro's dread bolt, that shakes the pole, The irraer purpose of his soul. With all its powers can shake.

"Should a sture's frame in ruins fall, And chaes o'er the sinking ball Resume primeval sway,

His courage chance and fate defice, Nor feels the wirck of earth and skies Obstruct its destined way "

If poetry exists independent of veisibilition, it will naturally be asked, how then is it to be distinguished? Undoubtedly by its own peculiar expression it has a language of its own, which speaks so feelingly to the heart, and so pleasingly to the magmation, that its meaning cannot possibly be misunderstood by any person of delicate sensutions. It is a species of painting with words, in which the figures are happily conceived, ingeniously arranged, affectingly expressed, and recommended with all the warnth and harmony of colouring it consists of magery, description, metaphors, similes, and sentiments, adapted with propriety to the subject, so contrived and executed as to soothe the car, surprise and delight the fancy, mend and melt the heart, elevate the mind, and please the understanding According to Flaccus:

- "Aut prodesse volunt, aut delectare pacte , Aut simul et jucunda et idonea dicere vite "
- "Poets would profit or delight mankind, And with th'amusing show th' instructive join'd"
- "Omne tulit punctum, qui miscuit utile dulei, Lectorem delectando pariterque monendo"
- "Profit and pleasure mingled thus with art, To soothe the fancy and improve the heart"

Tropes and figures are likewise liberally used in chetoric and some of the most celebrated orators have owned themselves much indebted to the posts. Theophrastus expressly recommends the poets for this purpose. From their source the spirit and energy of the pathetic, the sublime, and the beautiful are derived. But these figures must be more sparingly used in thetone than in poetry, and even their immediately with argumentation, and a detail of facts, altogether different from poetreal narration. The poet instead of simply relating the incident, strikes off a glowing picture of the scene, and exhibits it in the most lively colours to the eye of the imagination "It is reported that Homer was blind," says Tully in his Tusculan Questions, "yet his poetry is no other than painting What country, what climate, what ideas, battles, commotions, and contests of men, as well as of wild beasts, has he not painted in such a manner, as to bring before our eyes those very scenes which he himself could not behold?" We cannot, therefore, subscribe to the opinion of some ingenious critics, who have blumed Mr Pope for deviating in some instances from the simplicity of Homer, in his translation of the Iliad and Odyssey For example, the Greenin bard says simply "the sun rose," and the translator gives us a beautiful picture of the sun rising Homer mentions a person who played upon the lyre, the translator sets him before us waibling to the silver strings If this be a deviation, it is at the same time an improvement Homer himself, as Cicero observes above, is full of this kind of painting, and particularly fond of description, even in situations where the action seems to require haste Neptune, observing from Samothrace the discomfiture of the Grecians before Troy, flies to their assistance, and might have been wafted thither in half a line, but the bard describes him, first, descending the mountain on which he sat. secondly, striding towards his palace at Ægre, and yoking his horses, thirdly, he describes him putting on his atmour, and, lastly, ascending his car, and driving along the surface of the sea Fai from being disgasted by these delays, we are delighted with the particulars of the description Nothing can be more sublime than the circumstance of the mountum's trembling beneath the footsteps of an immortal,

60

61

΄. Τρέμε δ' οὐρέα μακρά καὶ ὕλη Ποσσὶν ὑπ' ἀθανάτοισι Ποσειδάωνος ἰόντος "

IX.]

But his pissage to the Grecian fleet is altogether transporting.

" Βη δ' έλαᾶν ἐπὶ κύματ'," κ.τ λ

"He mounts the car, the golden scourge applies, He sits superior, and the chariot flies; His whirling wheels the glassy surface sweep, Th' enormous monstery, tolling o'er the deep, Gambol around him on the watery way, And heavy whiles in wake and measures play; The sea subsiding spreads a level plain, Exults and crowns the monarch of the mun; The parting waves before his coursers fly, The wond rung waters leave his safe dry

With great veneration for the memory of Mi. Pope, we cannot help objecting to some lines of this translation. We have no idea of the sea's exulting and crowning Neptune, after it had subsided into a level plain. There is no such image in the original Homer says the whales exulted, and knew, or owned their king, and that the sea purted with joy γηθοσώτη δὲ θαλόσσα δώστατο. Neither is there a word of the wondering waters we therefore think the lines might be thus altered to advantage.

"They knew and own'd the monarch of the main The sea subsiding spreads a level plain, The curjing wives before his coursers fly, The putting surface leaves his brizen aske dry"

Desides the metaphors, similes, and allusions of poetry, there is an infinite variety of tropes, or turns of expression, occasionally disseminated through works of genus, which serve to animate the whole and distinguish the glowing effusions of real inspiration from the cold charts of meta-science. These tropes consist of a cert in happy choice and ariangment of words, by which ideas are artially disclosed in a great variety of attitudes, of epithets, and compound epithots, of sounds collected in order to echo the same conveyed, of apostrophes, and above all, the enchanting use of the presopopous, which is a kind of magic, by which the poet gives life and motion to every imminist part of nature. Homes, describing the weakling Agametinon, in the first book of the Had, stalkes off a glowing image in two words.

" . . Esse d' of -upl day-erdwert eterge"

"- und from his eyeballs flash'd the hving fire "

This indeed is a figure which has been copied by Virgil, and almost all the poets of every age—oculis muct as this syste—ignescent ire arrivable or osubuated Milton, describing Satan in hell, says.

"With head uphit above the wave, and eye That spariling blazd-

—He spike and to confirm his words out flew Milhous of flatning swords, drawn from the thighs Of mighty cherubin —The sudden blaze Far round illuminate hell—"

There are estim words in every language particularly adupted to the poetreal expression, some from the frange or ide they convey to the imagination, and some from the effect they have upon the car The first untilly figuratics, the others may be called amphatecal Eoliha observes that Virgil has, upon many occasions, postissed (if we may be allowed the expression) a whole sentence by means of the same word, which is pendere

14]

"Ite mez, felix quendam pecus, ite capelle; Non ego vos posthac, viridi projectus in antro, Dumosa pendere procul de rupe videbo"

"At ease reclined beneath the verdent shade No more shall I behold my happy flock Aloft hang browsing on the fufted rock,"

Here the word penders wonderfully improves the landscape, and tenders the whole presage beautifully picturesque. The same figurative verb we meet with in many different parts of the Æneid.

"H1 summo fluctu pendent, h1s unda dehiscens Terram inter fluctus aperit"

"These on the mountain billow hing, to those The yauning wares the yellow sand disclose"

In this instance the words pendent and dekiscons, kung and gawning, are equally poetical. Addison seems to have had this passage in his eye when he wrote his Hymn, which is inserted in the Spectator:

> "-For though in dreadful worlds we hung, High on the broken wave"

And in another piece of a like nature in the same collection

"Thy providence my life sustain'd, And all my wants rediess'd, When in the silent womb I lay, And hung upon the breast"

Shakespeare, in his admired description of Dover cliff, uses the same expression

"—helf way down Hangs one that guthers samphire—dreadful trade"

Nothing can be more beautiful than the following proture, in which Milton has introduced the same expressive tent

"—he, on his side Leaning, half raised, with looks of cordial lot a Hung over her enamour'd"

We shall give one example more from Viigil to show in what a variety of scenes it may appear with propilety and effect. In descaling the progrees of Dido's passion for Zeneas the poet says

> "Hrees iterum demons audire labores Exposeit, pendelque iterum marzatis ab oie "

"The wors of Troy once more she begg'd to hear, Once more the mournful tale employ'd his tongue, While in fend rapture on his lips she hing"

The reader will perceive, in all these instances, that no other word could be substituted with like energy, indeed, no other word could be used, without degrading the sense and defacing the image

There are many other verbs of poetseal import, fetched from nature and from ait, which the Poet, west to advantage, both in a hierd and metaphonical sense, and these have been always translated for the same purpose from one language to smother, such as guasse, concuter, cheo, severio, leno, severo, mano, fluo, ardeo, maco, aro, to shake, to wake, to rouse, to soothe, to rage, to flow, to shine or blaze, to plough—Quassantia tectum luma—American consu connessis accreto—Are care as os, Martemque accondere cantu—America acut lutaries et se suscitat wa—Impum lemite chamorem—Lembante wars—Ne sever magnus securidos—Sudor ad amos man hat colos—Suspensaque diu lacryma fluxers per ora—Jusconis ardebut anore Micat arreus ensis—Nullem man is aquer anadum. It will be unnecessary to insert examples of the same nature from the English poets.

The words we term emphatical are such as by their sound express the sense they are intended to convey, and with these the Greek abounds, above all other languages, not only from its natural copiousness, flexibility, and significance, but also from the variety of its dialects, which enables a writer to vary his terminations occasionally as the nature of the subject requires, without offending the most delicate ear, or incurring the imputation of adopting vulgar provincial expressions. Every smatterer in Greek can repeat

"βη δ' ἀκέων παρὰ θίτα πολυφλοισβοίο θαλάσσης,"

in which the two last words wonderfully echo to the sense, conveying the idea of the sea dashing on the shore. How much more significant in sound than that beautiful image of Shakespeare—

'The sea that on the unnumber d pebbles beats!"

And yet, if we consider the strictness of propriety, this last expression would seem to have been selected on purpose to concur with the other cursumstances which are brought together to ascertain the vast height of Dover cliff, for the poet adds, "cannot be heard so high." The place where Glo'ster stood was so high above the surface of the set, that the $\phi\logonime{\text{ord}}\text{ads}\text{, could not be heard, and therefore an enthusiastic admirer of Shakespeare might, with some plusibility, affirm the poet had chosen an expression in which that sound is not at all conveyed

In the very same page of Homer's Iliad we meet with two other striking instances of the same sort of beauty Apollo, incensed at the insults his priest had sustained, descends from the top of Olympus with his bow and quiver lattling on his shoulder as he moved along

"Εγλαγξαν δ' Ερ' οΐστοι επ' ώμων "

Here the sound of the word ¿kλαγέαν admirably ev messes the clanking of armour , as the third line after this surprisingly imitates the twanging of a how

" Δεισή δὲ κλαγγή γένετ' ἀργυρέοιο βιοΐο" In shrill toned murmurs mang the twanging bow "

Many be witnes of the same kind are scattered through Homei, Pindar, and Theocritus, such as the βομβεύσα uélinga, su in rans apicula, the abb pubipiqua, dulcem susua um, and the nextoberas, for the sighing of the nne

The Latin language teems with sounds adapted to every situation, and the English is not destitute of this significant energy We have the cooing turtle, the sighing reed, the warbling rivulet, the gliding stream, the whispering breeze, the glance, the gleam, the flash, the bickering flame, the dashing wave, the gushing spring, the howling blast, the rattling storm, the pattering shower, the crimp earth, the mouldering tower, the twanging bowstring, the clanging arms, the clanking chains, the turniling stars, the tinking chords. the trickling drops, the twittering swallow, the cawing rook, the screeching owl; and a thousand other words and epithets, wonderfully suited to the sense they moly

Among the select passages of poetry which we shall unsert by way of illustration, the reader will THE TENANTS OF THE LEASOWES 67

find instances of all the different tropes and figures which the best authors have adopted in the variety of their poetical works, as well as of the apostrophe, abrupt transition, repetition, and prosopopesia.

In the meantime it will be necessary still farther to analyse those principles which constitute the essence of poetical merit; to display those delightful parteries that teem with the fairest flowers of magination, and distinguish between the gaudy offspring of a cold inspired fancy and the glowing progeny, diffusing sweets, produced and invigorated by the sun of genius

X

THE TENANTS OF THE LEASONES HISTORY OF A POET'S GARDEN MISCELLANEOUS ESSAYS, NO 34

Or all men who form gay allusions of distant happiness, pethaps a poet is the most sanguine Such is the ardour of his hopes, that they often are equal to actual enjoyment, and he feels more in expectance then actual fruition I have often reguladed a character of this kind with some degree of envy A man possessed of such warm imagination commands all nature, and arrogates possessions of which the owner has a blunter relish. While life continues, the illuring prospect has before him, he travels in the pursuit with confidence, and resigns it only with his last breath

It is this happy confidence which gives life ittrue telish, and keeps up our spirits aimdst every distress and disappointment. How much less would be done, if a min knew how little he can do! how wretched a creature would be be, if he and the end as well as the beginning of his project I He would has nothing left but to it down in torpul de par, and exchange employment for actual calamity.

I was led into this train of thinking upon lately exiting the beautiful gardens of the late Mr. Shenstone, who was him elf a poet, and possessed of that warm margination, which made has ever foremost in the parsant of thing happiness. Could he but have foreseen the end of all his schemes, for whom he was improving, and what changes has designs were to undergo, he would have servely amused his innocent life with what, for several years, employed him in a most harmless member, and shindged his scanty fortune. As the progress of this improvement is a true picture of cublumary viersutude, I could not help calling up my ma gination which, while I walked pensively alone, suggested the following reverie

As I was turning my buck upon a beautiful piece of water enhanced with caseades and took work. and entering a dark walk by which ran a pratting brook, the genius of the place approved before me, but more resembling the God of Time, than him more peculiarly appointed to the cur of gardens Instead of shorts he bore a scythe, and he appeared rather with the implements of husbandry, than those of a modern gardener Having remembered this place in its pristing beauty, I could not help condoling with him on its present rumous situation I spoke to him of the many alterations which had been made, and all for the worse, of the * 1772 possession of his mind, the gurdens were opened to the visits of every stringer, and the country flocked cound to the walk, to criticise, to admire, and to do mischief. He soon found, that the admirers of his taste left by no means such strong marks of their applause, as the envious did of their malignity. All the windows of his temples, and the walls of his leterats, were impressed with the characters of profaneness, ignorance, and obscenty, his hedges were broken, his statues and urms defaced, and his lawns worn bare. It was now therefore necessary to shut up the gordens once more, and to deprive the public of that happiness which had before ceased to be his own.

"In this situation the poet continued for a time in the character of 1 je ilons lover; fond of the henrity he keeps, but unable to supply the axtravagance of every demand. The garden by this time was completely grown and finished, the marks of art were covered up by the luxumance of nature, the winding walks were grown dark, the brook assumed a natural sylvage, and the rocks were covered with moss. Nothing now remained but to enjoy the healthes of the place, when the poor poet died, and his gaiden was obliged to be sold for the benefit of those who had contributed to its sumbellishment.

"The beauties of the place had now for some time been colobrated as well in prose as in verse and all men of tasts wished for so envied a spot, where every turn was marked with the poefs pencil, and every walk awakened gemus and meditation. The first purchaser was one Mi Troepenny, a batton maker, who was possessed of these thousand pounds, and was willing also to be possessed of taste and gemus. x] THE TENANTS OF THE LEASOWES.

71

"As the poet's ideas were for the natural wildness of the landscape, the button-maker's were for the more regular productions of art. He conceived, perhaps, that as it is a beauty in a button to be of a regular pattern, so the same regularity ought to obtain in a landscape. Be this as it will, he employed the shears to some purpose, he clipped up the hedges, cut down the gloomy walks, made vistas upon the stables and hog-sties, and showed his friends that a man of taste should always be doing.

"The next candidate for taste and genus was a captain of a ship, who bought the garden because the tormer possessor could find nothing more to mend, but unfortunately he had a taste too. His great passion lay in building, in making Chinese temples, and cage-work summer-houses. As the place before had an appearance of retirement, and inspired meditation, he gave it a more peopled au every turn presented a cottage, or ice-house, or a temple, the improvement was converted into a little city, and it only wanted inhabitants to give it the air of a village in the East Indies.
"In this manner, in less than ten years, the

"In this manner, in less than ten years, the improvement has gone through the hands of as many proprietors, who were all willing to have taste, and to show their taste too. As the place had received its best finishing from the hand of the first possessor, so every innovator only lent a hand to do mischief. Those parts which were obscure, have been enlightened, those walks which led naturally, have been twisted into serpentine windings. The colour of the flowers of the field is not more various than the variety of tastes that have been employed here, and all in direct contradiction to the original aim of the first improver Could the original possesson but nevive, with what solrowful heart would he look upon his favourite spot again! He would scarcely recollect a Dryad or a Wood-nymph of his former acquaintance, and might perhaps find himsell as much a stranger in his own plantation as in the deserts of Stheris

XT

THE SAGACITY OF THE SPIDER FROM 'THE BEL,' No 4

Sir,-Animals, in general, are sagacious in proportion as they cultivate society. The elephant and the beaver show the greatest signs of this when united, but when man intrudes into their com-munities, they lose all their spirit of industry, and testify but a very small share of that sugarity for which, when in a social state, they are so remarkable

Among meets, the labours of the bee and the ant have employed the attention and admiration of the naturalist, but their whole sagacity is lost upon separation, and a single bee or ant seems destitute of every degree of industry, is the most stupid insect imaginable, languishes for a time in solitude, and soon dies

Of all the solitary msects I have ever remarked, the spider is the most segacions, and its actions, to me who have attentively considered them, seem almost to exceed belief. This insect is formed by nature for a state of war, not only upon other insects, but upon each other. For this state nature seems perfectly well to have formed it. Its head and breast are covered with a strong natural coat of mail, which is impenetrable to the attempts of every other insect, and its belly is enveloped in a soft pliant skin, which eludes the sting even of a wasp. Its legs are terminated by strong claws, not unlike those of a lobster, and their vast length, like spears, serves to keep every assailant at a distance.

Not worse furnished for observation than for an attack or a defence, it has several eyes, large, transparent, and covered with a horny substance, which, however, does not impede its vision. Besides this, it is furnished with the forceps above the mouth, which serves to kill or secure the prey already caught in its claws or its net.

Such are the implements of war with which the body is immediately furnished; but its net to entangle the enemy seems what it chiefly trusts to. and what it takes most pains to render as complete as possible Nature, by a curious provision, has furnished the body of this little creature with a glutinous haund which it spins into thread, coarser or finer, according to the object it has in view. In order to fix its thread, when it begins to weave it emits a small diop of its liquid against the wall, which, hardening by degrees. serves to hold the thread very firmly, then receding from the first point, as it recedes the thread lengthens, and, when the spider has come to the place where the other end of the thread should be fixed, gathering up with its claws the thread. which would otherwise be too slack, it is stretched

before

In this manner it spins and fixes several threads pirillel to each other, which, so to speak, serve as the warp to the intended web. To form the woof, it spins in the same manner its thread, transversely fixing one cau to the first thread that was spun, and which is always the strongest of the whole web, and the other to the wall. All these threads, being newly spun, are glutinous, and therefore stick to each other whenever they happen to touch, and in those puts of the web most exposed to be torn, our natural artist strengthens them, by doubling the threads sometimes sixfold. Thus far naturalists have gone in the description of this animal, what follows is the result of my own observation upon that species of the insect called a hours epider. I perceived, about four years ago, a large spider in one corner of my room, making its

the uses called in the task of the linesest called in the use spader in one corner of my room, making its web, and, though the maid frequently levelled her fittl broom against the labours of the little animal, I had the good fortune then to perent its destruction, and, I may say, it more than paid me by the cutertainment it afforded

In three days the web was, with incredible dilaging, completed; nor could I avoid thinking that the user's against a wall, in the new days the web was.

In three days the web was, with meredible diligence, completed; nor could I avoid thinking, that the most seemed to exult in its new abode. It frequently traversed it round, examined the strength of every part of it, refund into its hole, and came out very frequently. The first enemy, however, it had to encounter, was another and a much larger polety, which, having no webof its own, and having probably exhausted all its slock in former labours of this kind, came to inside the property of its 78

XΠ

CHINESE LETTERS, OR, THE CITIZEN OF THE WORLD

THE EDITOR'S PREFACE

The schoolmen had formerly a very exact way of compuling the abilities of their sunts or authors Escobar, for instance, was said to have learning as five, genues as four, and gravity as seven. Caramuel was greater than he His learning was as eight, his genues as six, and his gravity as threteen. Were I to estimate the ment of our Chinese Philosopher by the same scale. I would not hesitate to state his genues thil higher; but as to his learning and gravity, these, I think, might safely be marked as nine hundred and ninety-nine, within one degree of absolute frigidity.

Yet, upon his first appearance here, many were angry not to find him as ignorant as a Trippine ambiassador or an envo from Mujac. They were surprised to find a man born so far from London, that school of prudence and wisdom, endued even with a moderate caprocity. They expressed the same surprise at his knowledge that the Chinese do of ours. "How comes it," said they, "that the Europeans, so remote from China, think with so much justice and precision? They have never read our books, they carrely know even our letters, and yet they talk and reason just as we do." The truth is, the Chinese and we are postty much alike. Different degrees of refinoment, and not of distance, mark the distinctions among manked. Savages of the most opposite climates have all but one character of improvidence and lapacity, and tutored nations, however separate, make use of the very same methods to procure refined enjoyment

VII ] THE CITIZEN OF THE WORLD PREFACE 79

The distinctions of polite nations are few, but such as are neculiar to the Chinese appear in every page of the following correspondence. The metaphois and allusions are all drawn from the East Then formality our author carefully preserves Many of their favourite tenets in morals are illustrated The Chinese are always concise; so is he Simple, so is he. The Chinese are grave and sententious, so is he But in one particular the resemblance is peculiarly striking, the Chinese are often dull, and so is he Nor has my assistance been wanting We are told in an old romance of a certain knight-eriant and his house who contracted an intimate friendship. The horse most usually bore the knight, but, in cases of extraordinary dispatch, the knight returned the favour, and carried his horse Thus, in the intimacy between my author and me, he has usually given me a lift of his eastern sublimity, and I have sometimes given him a return of my colloquial ease

Tet it appears strange, in this season of panegyi'c, when scarcely an author passes unpraised either by his friends or himself, that such merit as our Philosophia's should be forgotten. While the epithets of ingenious, copious, elaborate, and is fined are lavished among the mob, like medals at a coronation, the lucky prives fall on every side, but not one on him I could on this occasion make myself melancholy, by considering the capticiousness of public taste, or the mutability of fortune, but during this fit of moiality, lest my reader should sleep, I'll take a uap myself, and when I awake tell hum my

I imagined the Thames was frozen over, and I stood by its side. Several booths were exected upon the roe, and I was told by one of the speciators, that Fashion Fan was going to begin. He added, that severy author who could early he works there might probably find a very good receptaon. I was resolved, however, to observe the humours of the place in safety from the shore; sensible that ree was at best precarrous, and having been always a little cowardly in my deep.

Several of my acquaintance seemed much more haily thun I, and went over the ice with interpolity Some curried their works to the fair on sledges, some on caris and those which were more voluminous were conveyed in waggons. Then temerity astonished me I knew their cargoes were heavy, and expected every moment they would have gone to the bottom. They all entered the fair, however, in safety, and each soon after returned, to my great supprise, highly classical with his entertainment and the bargams he had brought away.

The success of such numbers at last began to operate upon me if these, craed I, meet with invous and safety, some luck may, perhaps, for once attend the unfortunate. I am resolved to make a new adventure. The furniture, frippery, and fireworks of China bave long been fashumably bought up. I'll try the fair with a small carge of Chinase unenably. If the Chinese bave containated to vita it out taste, I'll try how in they can help to improve your understanding. But, as others have driven into the market in waggons, I'll cautiously begin by venturing with a wheelbarrow. Thus resolved, I buled up my goods, and fairly ventured, when, upon just entering the fair, I fancied the fee, that had supported an hundred waggons before, cracked under me, and whoelbarrow and all went to the bottom.

Upon awaking from my revene with the tright, I cannot help wishing that the pains taken in giving this correspondence an English dress had been employed in containing new political systems, or new plots for farces I might then have taken my station in the world, either as a poet or a philosopher, and made one in those little societies where men club to naise each other's reputation. But at present I helong to no particular class I resemble one of those animals that has been forced from its forest to gratify human currosity. My earliest wish was to escape unheeded through life, but I have been set up for half-pence, to fret and scamper at the end of my chain Though none are injured by my rage, I am naturally too savage to court any friends by fawning, too obstinate to be taught new tricks, and too improvident to mind what may happen I am appeased, though not contented Too indolent for intrigue, and too timid to push for favour, I am-But what signifies what am I?

> " Έλπὸς καὶ σὰ τύχη μέγο γαίρετε τὸν λιμέν' εῦρον Ουδὲν ἐμοί χ' υμίν παίζετε τούς μιτ' ἐιὰ "

&quot;Hope and Chunce, fare ye well I have found my port I have no longer any need of you; make your sport of those who shall come the me."

XIIL

THE CHINESE PHILOSOPHER VISITS WESTMINSTER A renty

I am just returned from Westminster Abbey, the place of sepulture for the philosophers, heroes, and kings of England What a gloom do monumental inscriptions and all the venerable remains of deceased ment inspire! Imagine a temple marked with the hand of antiquity, solemn as religious live, adorned with all the magnificence of barbarous profusion, dim windows, fietted pillars, long colonnados, and dark ceilings. Think, then, what were my sensations at being introduced to such a scene I stood in the midst of the temple, and threw my eyes round on the walls, filled with the statues, the inscriptions, and the monuments of the dead

Alas! I said to myself, how does mide attend the puny child of dust even to the grave! Even humble as I am, I possess more consequence in the present scene than the greatest hero of them all they have toiled for an hour to gain a transient immortality, and are at length retired to the grave, where they have no attendant but the worm, none to flatter but the epitaph

As I was indulging such reflections, a gentlem in diessed in black, perceiving me to be a stranger, came up, entered into conversation, and politely offered to be my instructor and guide through the temple "It any monument," -ud he, "should excite your curiosity, I shall endeavour to satisfy your demands" I accepted, with thanks, the AND THE VISIT TO WESTMINSTER ARERY 8:

gentleman's ofter, adding, that "I was come to observe the policy, the wisdom, and the justice of the English, in conferring rewards upon deceased merit. If adulation like this," continued I, "be properly conducted, as it can in no ways injure these who are flattered, so it may be a glorious incentive to those who are now capable of enjoying it. It is the duty of every good government to turn this monumental pude to its own advantage, to become strong in the aggregate from the weakness of the individual If none but the truly great have a place in this awful repository, a temple like this will give the finest lessons of morality, and be a strong incentive to true ambition I am told, that none have a place here but characters of the most distinguished ment" The Man in Black seemed impatient at my observations, so I discontinued my remarks, and we walked on together to take a view of every particular monument in order as it lay As the eye is naturally caught by the finest objects, I could not avoid being particularly enrious about one monument, which appeared more beautiful than the rest "That," said I to my guide, "I take to be the tomb of some very great man By the peculiar excellence of the workmanship, and the magnificence of the design, this must be a trophy rused to the memory of some king who has saved his country from ruin, or law-giver who has reduced his fellow-citizens from anarchy into just subjection "-" It is not requisite," replied my com-prinon, smiling, "to have such qualifications in order to have a very fine monument here: more humble abilities will suffice."-" What! I suppose. then, the gaming two or three battles, or the taking half a score of towns, is thought a sufficient qualification?"- Gaining battles, or taking towns," replied the Man in Black, "may be of service, but a gentleman may have a very fine monument here without ever seeing a battle or a siege "-"This, then, is the monument of some poet, I presume -of one whose wit has gained him immortality?" -" No. su," replied my guide, "the gentleman who hes here never made verses, and as for wif, he despised it in others, because he had none himself " -" Pray tell me, then, in a word," said I, peevishly, "what is the great man who lies here particularly remarkable for ?"-"Remarkable, sir!" said my companion, "why, sir, the gentleman that lies here is remarkable, very remarkable—for a tomb in Westminster Abbey" -- But, head of my ancestors ' how has he got here? I fancy he could never bribe the guardians of the temple to give him a place. Should he not be ashamed to be seen among company where even moderate ment would look like infamy ?"-"I suppose," replied the Man in Black, "the gentleman was rich, and his friends, as is usual in such a case, told him he was great He really believed them; the guardians of the temple, as they got by the selfdelusion, were ready to behave him too, so he prid his money for a fine monument, and the workman, as you see, has made him one of the most heautiful, Think not, however, that this gentleman is singular in his desire of being builed among the great; there are several others in the temple, who, hated and shunned by the great while alive, have come here fully resolved to keep them company now they are dead "

81

As we walked along to a particular put of the temple, "There," says the gentleman, pointing with his finger, "that is the Poet's Corner, there you see the monuments of Shake-peare, and Malton, and Prior, and Drayton."- Drayton " I replied, "I never heard of him before, but I have been told of one Pope -is he there?"-"It is time enough," replied my guide, "these hundred years, he is not long dead, people have not done hating him yet"-"Strange," cried I. "can any be found to hate a man whose life was wholly spent in entertaining and instructing his fellow-creatures?"-"Yes," says my guide, "they hate him for that yeav reason. There are a set of men called answerers of books, who take upon them to watch the republic of letters, and distribute reputation by the sheet; they somewhat resemble the eunuchs in a seraglic, who are incapable of giving pleasure themselves, and hinder those that would These answerers have no other employment but to cry out Dunce and Scribbler, to praise the dead and sevile the living , to grant a man of confessed abilities some small share of merit, to applaud twenty blockheads in order to gain the reputation of candour, and to revile the moral character of the man whose writings they cannot injure. Such wretches are kept in pay by some mercenaly bookseller, or more frequently the bookseller himself takes this dirty work off their hands, as all that is required is to be very abusive and very dull. Every poet of any genius is sure to find such enemies; he feels, though he seems to despise, their malice, they make him miserable here, and in the pursuit of empty tame, at last he gains solid anxiety"

"Has this been the case with every poet I see here?" cried I — "Yes, with every mother's son 86 of them," replied he, "except he happened to be boin a mandaim. If he has much money, he may buy reputation from your book answers, as well as a monument from the guardians of the temple"

Fam

"But one there not some men of di-tinguished taste, as in China, who are willing to pationish men of ment, and soften the rancour of malevolent dulness?"

"I own there are many," replied the Man in Black,
"but alas! ar, the book-answerers crowd about them, and call themselves the writers of books, and the patron is too indolent to distinguish thus posts are kept at a distance, while their enemies cat up all their rewards at the mandain's table."

Leaving this part of the temple, we made up to an non gate, through which my companion told me we were to pass, in order to see the monuments of the kings Accordingly, I marched up without further ceremony, and was going to enter, when a person who held the gate in his hand told me I must pay first I wis surprised at such a demand, and asked the man, whether the people of England kept a show!-whether the paltry sum he demanded was not a national repreach?—whether it was not more to the honour of the country to let their magnifirence or them antiquities be openly seen, than thus meanly to tax a curiosity which tended to their own honour?"_"As for your questions," lephed the gatekeeper, "to be sure they may be very right, because I don't understand them, but, as for that there threepence, I farm it from one-who rents at from another-who aires it from a thirdwho leases it from the guardians of the temple; and we all must live" I expected, upon paying here, to AHI ] THE VISIT TO WESTMINSTER ABBEY. 87 see something extraordinary, since what I had seen for nothing filled me with so much surprise but in this I was disappointed, there was little more within than black coffins, justy armour, tattered standards, and some few slovenly figures in wax. I was sorry I had paid, but I comforted myself by considering it would be my last pryment A person attended us who without once blushing told an hundred hes. he talked of a lady who died by pricking her finger, of a king with a golden head. and twenty such pieces of absurdity "Look ye

there, gentlemen," says he, pointing to an old oak chair, "there's a curiosity for ye, in that chair the kings of England were crowned, you see also a stone underneath, and that stone is Jacob's pillow " I could see no curiosity either in the oak chair or the stone could I, indeed, behold one of the old kings of England seated in this, or Jacob's head laid upon the other, there might be something curious in the sight, but in the present case, there was no more reason for my surprise, than if I should pick a stone from their streets, and call it a curiosity, merely because one of the kings happened to tread upon it as he passed in a procession From hence our conductor led us through several dark walks and winding ways, uttering hes, talking to himself, and flourishing a wand which he held in his hand He reminded me of the black magicians of Kobi After we had been almost fatigued with a variety of objects, he at last desired me to consider attentively a certain suit of armour, which seemed to show nothing remarkable "This armour," said he, "belonged to General Monk"-" Very surprising that a general should wear armour!"-" And pray." 83

added he, "observe this cap, this is General Monk's cap"-"Very strange indeed very strange that a general should have a cap also! Pray, friend, what might this cap have cost originally?"-"That, sit." says he, "I don't know, but this cap is all the wages I have for my trouble "-" A very small recompense, truly," said I -" Not so very small," replied he, "for every gentleman puts some money nto it, and I spend the money "-"Whit, more money! still more money! Every gentleman gives comething, sir."—"I'll give thee nothing," returned I, "the guardians of the temple should pay you your wages, friend, and not permit you to squeeze thus from every spectator. When we pay our money at the door to see a show, we never give more as we are going out Sure, the guardians of the temple can never think they get enough Show me the gate, if I stay longer, I may probably meet with more of those ecclesiastical beggais"

Thus leaving the temple precipitately, I returned to my lodgings, in order to ruminate over what was great, and to despise what was mean, in the occurrences of the day.

XIV

RECEPTION OF THE CHINESE PHILOSOPHLE BY A LADA or Distinction

I was some days ago agreeably surprised by a message from a lady of distinction, who sent me word, that she most passionately desired the pleasuro of my acquaintance, and with the utmost impatience expected an interview I will not deny, my dear

Fum Hoam, but that my vanity was raised at such an invitation: I flattered myself that she had seen me in some public place, and had conceived an affection for my person, which thus induced her to deviate from the usual decorums of the sex My imagination painted her in all the bloom of youth and beauty I fancied her attended by the Loves and Graces, and I set out with the most pleasing expectations of seeing the conquest I had made

When I was introduced into her apaitment, my expectations were quickly at an end I perceived a little shrivelled figure indolently reclined on a soft, who nodded, by way of approbation, at my approach This, as I was afterwards informed, was the lady herself,-a woman equally distinguished for rank, politeness, taste and understanding As I was diessed after the fashion of Europe, she had taken me for an Englishman, and consequently saluted me in her ordinary manner but when the footman informed her glace that I was the gentleman from

Chuna, she instantly lifted herself from the couch, while her eyes sparkled with unusual vivacity "Bless me | can this be the gentleman that was born so far from home? What an unusual share of somethingness in his whole appearance! Loid, how I am charmed with the outlandish cut of his face how bewitching the exotic breadth of his forehead! I would give the world to see him in his own country dress Pray, turn about, sir, and let me see you behind There, there's a travelled air for you. You that attend there, bring up a plate of beef cut into small pieces, I have a violent passion to see him eat. Pray, sir, have you got your chop sticks about you? It will be so pretty to see the meat carried to the mouth with a jerk Pray, speak a little Chinese I have lcarned some of the language myself. Lord | have you nothing pretty from China about you, something that one does not know what to do with? I have got twenty things from China that are of no use in the world Look at those pas, they are of the right pea-green these are the furnitine ! "- 'Dear madam," said I, " these, though they may appear fine in your eves, are but paltry to a Chinese , but as they are useful utensils, it is more they should have a place in every anartment "-" Useful, sir " replied the lady, " sure you mistake, they are of no use in the world "-" What! are they not filled with an infusion of tea, as in China?" replied I -"Quite empty and useless, upon my honour, sn "-"Then they are the most cumbrons and clums; furniture in the world, as nothing is tiuly elegant but what unites use with beauty "-" I protest," says the lady, "I shall begin to suspect thee of being an actual barbirian suppose you hold my two beautiful pageds in contempt "-" What!" cried I, "has Fohi spread his gross superstitions here also! Pagods of all kinds are my aversion "-" A Chinese, a traveller, and want taste! It surprises me Pray, sir, examine the beauties of that Chinese temple which you see at the end of the garden Is there anything in China more beautiful?"-"Where I stand, I see nothing, madam, at the end of the garden, that may not as well be called an Egyptian pyramid as a Chinese temple, for that little building in view is as like the one as t'other "-" What, su! is not that a Chinese temple? you must surely be mistaken

VIV. 1 RECEPTION OF THE PHILOSOPHER Mr Freeze, who designed it, calls it one, and nobody disputes his pretensions to taste" I now

91

found it vam to contradict the lady in anything she though fit to advance, so was resolved rather to act the disciple than the instructor She took me through several rooms, all furnished, as she told me, in the Chinese manner, sprawling dragons, squatting pageds, and clumsy mandarins were stuck upon every shelf in turning round, one must have used caution not to demolish a part of the precarious

fui nitura In a house like this, thought I, one must live continually upon the watch, the inhabitant must resemble a knight in an enchanted castle, who expects to meet an adventure at every turning "But, madam," said I, "do not accidents ever happen to all this finery ?"-" Man, sn," replied the lady, "18 born to misfortunes, and it is but fit I should have a share Three weeks ago, a careless servant snapped off the head of a favourite mandarm: I had scarce done grieving for that, when a monkey broke a beautiful jar, this I took the more to heart, as the mjury was done me by a friend However, I survived the calamity, when yesterday crash went half-a-dozen dragons upon the marble hearthstone and yet I live, I survive it all you can't conceive what comfort I find under afflictions from philosophy There is Seneca, and Boling broke, and some others, who guide me through life, and teach me to support its calamities." I could not but smile at a woman who makes her own misfortunes, and then deplotes the miseries of her situation Wherefore, tired of acting with dissimulation, and willing to indulge my meditations in solitude, I took leave just as the servant was bringing in a plete of beef, pursuant to the directions of his mistress.—Adieu.

XV

English Treatment of French Prisoners

YET, while I sometimes liment the case of humanity, and the deprayity of human inture, there now and then appear gleams of greatness, that serve to 10-live the eye oppressed with the indeous prospect, and resemble those calitysted spots that are cometimes found in the midst of an Asiatac wilderness I see many superior excellences among the English, which is not in the power of all their follies to hide I see virtues, which in other countries are known only to a few, practised here by every rank of people

I know not whether it proceeds from their superior opulence that the English are mote charitable than the rest of matind, whether by being possessed of all the conveniences of life than the rest have more lesure to priceive the uneasy struction of the distressed whatever he the motive, they are not only the most charitable of any other nation, but most judicious in distinguishing the properest objects of compassion

In other countries, the giver is generally influenced by the immediate impulse of pity, his generousty is everted as nucle to relueve his own newsy sensatams as to comfort the object in distress. In England, benefactions me of a mote general nature. Some men of fortune and universal and the ments of the petitioners are canvassed by the people; neither passion nor pity find a place in the cool discussion, and charity is then only exerted when it has received the approbation of reason

03

11.12

A late instance of this finely-directed benevolence forces itself so strongly on my imagination, that it in a manner reconciles me to pleasure, and once more makes me the universal friend of man. The English and French have not only political reasons to induce them to inutual hatred, but often the more prevailing motive of a private interest to widen the breach A war between other countries is carried on collectively, aimy fights against aimy, and a man's own private resentment is lost in that of the community, but in England and France, the individuals of each country plunder each other at sea without redress, and consequently feel that animosity against each other which passengers do at a robber They have for some time carried on an expensive war, and several captives have been taken on both sides. those made pissoners by the French have been used with cruelty and guarded with unnecessary caution those taken by the English, being much more numerous, were confined in the ordinary manner, and not being released by their countrymen, began to feel all those inconveniences which arise from want of covering and long confinement Then countrymen were informed of then deplorable situation, but they, more intent on annoying their enemies than relieving their friends, refused the least assistance. The English now

١

san thousunds of their fellow cutatures starting in every prison, forsaken by these whose duty it was to protect them, labouring with disease, and without clothes to keep off the severity of the venson National benevolence prevailed over unbional animosity, their pursoners were indeed enemies, but they were enumes in distress, they corsed to be hateful when they no longer continued to be formidable forgetting, therefore, their national hatred, the men who were brave enough to con quer, were generous enough to forgive and they whom all the world scenied to have disclaimed, at last found pity and redress from those they attempted to subdue A subscription n is opened, ample charities collected, proper necessaries pro cured, and the poor gay sons of a merry nation were once more taught to resume their former guicty

When I cast my eye over the list of those who contributed on this occasion, I find the names almost entirely English, scarce one foreigner appears among the number It was for Englishmen alone to be capable of such evalted virtue I own I cannot look over this catalogue of good men and philosophers, without thinking better of myself, because it makes me entertain a more favourable oninion of mankind I am particularly statick with one who writes these words upon the paper that enclosed his benefaction "The mite of an English man, a citizen of the world, to Frenchmen, prisoners of war, and naked." I only wish that he may find as much pleasure from his virtues as I have done in reflecting upon them, that alone will amply reward him Such a one, my friend, is an honour to human nature, he makes no private distinctions of party, all that are stamped with the divine image of their Cicator are friends to him he is a native of the world, and the Emperor of China may be proud that he has such a county man

To rejoice at the destruction of our enemies is a foible grafted upon human nature, and we must be permitted to indulge it the true way of atoning for such an ill-founded pleasure, is thus to turn our triumph into an act of benevolence, and to testify our own joy by endeavouring to banish anxiety from others

Hamti, the best and wisest emperor that ever filled the throne, after having gained three signal victories over the Tartais, who had invaded his dominions, ieturned to Naukin, in order to enjoy the glory of his conquest. After he had rested for some days, the people, who are naturally fond of processions, impatiently expected the triumphant entry which emperors upon such occasions were carefully which emperors upon such occasions were entry which emperors upon such occasions were entry which emperors the naturally of a different three different proofs of the interest of the loved his people, and was willing to do all in his power to satisfy their just desires the threefore assured them, that he intended, upon the next feast of the Lanteins, to exhibit one of the most glorious triumphs that had ever been seen in Chin i.

The people were in raptures at his condescension, and, on the appointed day, assembled at the gates of the palace with the most eager expectations. Here they waited for some time, without seeing any of those preparations which usually precede a pageant. The lantern with ten thousand tipers was not yet brought forth, the fireworks, which usually covered the city walls, were not yet lighted the people once more began to murmur at this delay, when, in the midst of their impitience, the palace-gates flew open, and the empeior himself appeared, not in splendom or magnificence, but in ordinary habit, followed by the blind, the maimed, and the strangers of the city, all in new clothes, and each carrying in his hand money enough to supply his necessities for the year. The people were at first imused, but soon perceived the wisdom of their king, who taught them, that to make one man happy was more truly streat than having ten thousand captives growing at the wheels of his chariot—Adien

TVZ

THE MAN IN BLACK.

Though fond of many acquaintances, I desire an intimacy only with a few. The Man in Black whom I have often mentioned, is one whose friendship I could wish to acquire, because he possesses my esteem. His manners, it is true, are tructured with some strange inconsistencies, and he may be justly termed a humorist in a nation of humorists Though he is generous even to profusion, he effects to be thought a produce of parsimone and prudence though his conversation be replete with the most sorded and selfish maxims, his heart is dilated with the most unbounded love I have known him profess himself a min-hater, while his cheek was glowing with compassion, and, while his looks were softened into pity, I have heard him use the language of the most unbounded ill nature Some affect humanity and tendences, others boast of having such dispositions from nature, but he is the only man I eveknew who seemed ashamed of his natural benevolence. He takes as much pains to hide his feelings, as any hypocrite would to conceal his indifference, but on every unguarded moment the mask diops off, and reveals him to the most superficial observer.

In one of our late excursions into the country, happening to discourse upon the provision that was made for the poor in England, he seemed amazed how any of his countrymen could be so foolishly weak as to relieve occasional objects of charity, when the laws had made such ample provision for their support "In every parish-house," says he, "the poor are supplied with food, clothes, fire, and a bed to lie on , they want no more, I desire no more myself, yet still they seem discontented I am surpused at the inactivity of our magnetiates, in not taking up such vagiants, who are only a weight upon the industrious, I am surprised that the people are found to relieve them, when they must be at the same time sensible that it in some me isure encourages idleness, extravagance, and imposture Were I to advise any man for whom I had the least regard, I would caution him by all means not to be imposed upon by their false pietences, let me assure you, sii, they are impostors, every one of them, and rather merit a prison than relief "

He was proceeding in this strain, earnestly to dissuade me from an improdence of which I am seldom guilty, when an old man, who still had about him the remnants of tattered finery, implored our compassion. He assured us that he was no common beggar, but forced into the shameful profession to 12 support a dying wife and five hangiy clabbren. Being proposessed against such fidschoods, his story had not the least influence upon no , but it vas unite otherwise with the Man in Blue! I could too it visibly operate upon his counterrace, and effects ally interrupt his historique. I could craft perceive, that his heart barned to rehere the five starring children, but he seemed ashamed to discover his weakness to me. While he thus heartsted between compassion and pade, I pretended to look another way, and he sened this opportunity of giving the poor petitioner a piece of silver, bidding him at the same time, in order that I should hear, go work for his bread, and not terse presengers with such importment filsehoods for the future.

As he had functed himself quite unperceived, he continued, as we proceeded, to rail against beggarwith as much ammosity as before he throw in some episodes on his own amazing printence and economy, with his profound skill in discovering impostors, he sexplained the minner in which he would deal with Joggars were he a magistrate, hinted at enlarging some of the pursons for their reception, and told two es of lidies that were robbed by beggar men see so if rides that were robbed by beggan men storbys beginning a third to the same purpose, when He we with a woodlen leg once more crossed our a saids suring our pits, and blessing out limbs. I wakes, degree out that taking any notice, but my was for 20° ag wretfully upon the poor petitioner, fireful, look-ad he would show me with how much bid me stopt, any time detect an impostor case he could they are tone began to examine the saids, and in an angle, the new, the look of importance, and in an angle, the negagement he was thus dis demanding in we negagement he was thus dis abled and rendered unfit for service. The sailor replied, in a tone as angrily as he, that he had been an officer on board a private ship of war, and that he had lost his leg abroad, in defence of those who did nothing at home At this reply, all my friend's unportance vanished in a moment, he had not a single question more to ask, he now only studied what method he should take to relieve him unobserved He had, however, no easy part to act, as he was obliged to preserve the appearance of illnature before me, and yet relieve himself by relieving the sailor. Casting, therefore, a furious look upon some bundles of chips which the fellow carried in a string at his back, my friend demanded how he sold his matches, but, not waiting for a reply, desired, in a surly tone, to have a shilling's worth. The sailor seemed at first surprised at his demand, but soon recollecting himself, and presenting his whole bundle, "Here, master," says he, "take all my cargo, and a blessing into the bargain"

It is impossible to describe with what an air of triumph my friend marched off with his new purchase, he assured me, that he was family of opinion that those tellows must have stolen their goods, who could thus afford to sell them for half value He informed me of several different uses to which those chips might be applied, he expatiated largely upon the savings that would result from lighting candles with a match, instead of thrusting them into the fire. He averred, that he would as soon have parted with a tooth as his money to those rigationds, unless for some valuable consideration I cannot tell how long this panegyric upon frugality and matches might have continued, had not his attention been called off by another object more distressful than either of the former. A woman in rags, with one child in her ring, and another on her back, was attempting to ing billeds, but with such a mournful voice, that it was difficult to determine whether she was singing or crying. A wretch, who in the deepest distress still named at good-humour, was an object my friend was by no means capable of withstanding; his vitarity and his discours were instantly interrupted, upon this occusion, his very dissimulation had for aken him Deen in my mesence he immediately applied his hands to his pockets, in order to relieve her, but gues, his confusion when he found he had already given away all the mency he carried about him to former objects The misery painted in the woman's risige was not half so strongly expressed as the agony in las. He continued to scuch for some time, but to no purpose, till, at length recollecting himself, with a fice of meffable good-nature, as he had no money, he put into her hands his shilling's worth of mitches

XVII

THE MAN IN BEACH

As there appeared something reductantly good in the chriacter of my companion, I must own it surprised me what could be his motives for thus concealing virtues which others take such pains to display I was unable to repress my deane of knowing the history of a man who thus "comed to act under continual restraint, and whose benevolence was rather the effect of appetite than reason, It was not, however, till after repeated solicitations

he thought proper to gratify my curiosity. "If you are fond," says he, "of hearing hairbreadth 'scapes; my history must certainly please, for I have been for twenty years upon the very verge of starving. without ever being starved.

"My father, the younger son of a good family, was possessed of a small living in the church. His education was above his fortune, and his generosity greater than his education Poor as he was, he had his flatterers, still poorer than himself, for every dinner he gave them they returned an equivalent in praise, and this was all he wanted The same ambition that actuates a monarch at the head of an army influenced my father at the head of his table he told the story of the my-tree, and that was laughed at, he repeated the jest of the two scholars and one pan of breeches, and the company laughed at that, but the story of Tafty in the sedan-chan was since to set the table in a rear thus his pleasure increased in proportion to the pleasure he gave, he loved all the world, and he fancied all the world loved him

"As his fortune was but small, he lived up to the very extent of it, he had no intentions of leaving his children any money, for that was dross, he was resolved they should have learning, for learning, he used to observe, was better than silver or gold For this purpose, he undertook to instruct us himself; and took as much passes to form our morals as to improve our understanding. We were told, that universal benevolence was what first cemented society, we were taught to consider all the wants of mankind is our own, to legard the human face divine with affection and esteem, he would us up to be mere machines of pity, and rendered us manyable of with-standing the slightest impulse made either by real or fictations distress in a word, we were perfectly instructed in the ait of giving away thou-wids, before we were tangeth the more necessary qualifications of getting a farthing

"I cannot avoid imagining, that thus refined by his lessons out of all my suspicion, and directed of even all the hitle cuaning which nature had given me, I resembled, upon my first entrance into the busy and insideus world, one of those gladrators who were exposed without remoor m the anaphithcates at Rome. By father, however, who had only seen the world on one sade, seemed to triumph in my superior disconnient through my whole stock of wisdom consisted in heigh the to talk like himself upon subjects that once were useful, because they were then topics of the busy world, but that more were atterly useless, because connected with the busy vorid no longer.

"The first opportunity he had of finding his capacitation disappointed was in the very middling figure I in die in the university, he had firstened himself that he alcould soon are me riving into the foremost rank in literary regulation, but wis mor taked to find me unitering immortated and unknown. His disappointment neight have been parity ascribed to his harmy overmed my talents, and putly to my dislike of mathematical reasonings, at a time when any integrnation and memory, yet my tasked, where more eager lafter new objects than desirous of reasoning upon those I knew. This shid not, how ever, please my tuton, who observed, indeed, that I was a little dull, but at the same time allowed, that I seemed to be very good-natured, and had no haim in me

ınır

"After I had resided at college seven years, my father died, and left me—his blessing. Thus shoved from shore without ill-nature to protect, or cunning to guide, or proper stores to subsist me in so dangerous a voyage, I was obliged to embask in the wide world at twenty-two. But, in order to settle in hite, my friends advised (for they always advise when they begin to despise us), they advised me, I say, to go into orders.

"To be obliged to wear a long wig, when I liked

a short one, or a black coat, when I generally dressed in brown, I thought was such a restraint upon my liberty, that I absolutely rejected the proposal. A priest in England is not the same mortified creature with a bonce in China. with us, not he that fasts best, but eats best, is reckoned the best liver, yet I rejected a life of luxury, indolence, and ease, from no other consideration, but that boyish one of dress So that my friends were now perfectly satisfied I was undone, and yet they thought it a pity for one who had not the least harm in him and was so very good-natured.

"Poverty naturally begets dependence, and I was admitted as flatteier to a greet man. At first, I was suppred that the situation of a flatterer at a great man's table could be thought disagreeable there was no greet trouble in betening attentively when his lordship spoke, and laughing when he looked for appliance. This even good manners might have obliged me to perform. I found, however, too soon.

106

[xvii

-vou want two hundred pounds Do you only want two hundred, sir, exactly ? '-- 'To confess ! truth,' returned I, 'I shall want three hundred ; but then I have another friend, from whom I can borrow the rest'-'Why, then,' replied my friend, 'if you would take my advice (and you know I should not presume to advise you but for your own good), I would recommend it to you to borrow the whole sum from that other friend, and then one note will serve for all, you know '

"Poverty now began to come fast upon me, yet instead of growing more provident or cautious as I grew poor, I became every day more indolent and simple A friend wis miested for fifty pounds, I was unable to extricate him, except by becoming his bail When at liberty, he fled from his creditors, and left me to take his place. In prison I expected greater satisfactions than I enjoyed at large. I hoped to converse with men in this new world, sample and believing like my-elf, but I found them, as cunning and as crutious as those in the world I had left behind They spunged up my money while this was done because they believed me to be very good-natured, and knew that I had no harm in me "Upon my first entrance into this mansion, which is to some the abode of despair, I felt no sensation different from those I experienced abroad I was now on one side the door, and those who were unconfined were on the other this was all the difference between us At first, indeed, I felt some uneasiness, in considering how I should be able to it lasted, borrowed my coals and never paid for them, and cheated me when I played at clibbage All provide this week for the wants of the week ensuing; but after some time, if I found myself sure of eating one day, I never troubled my head how I was to bupplied another I seized every precarious meal with the utmost good-humour; indulged no rants of spleen at my situation, never called down Heaven and all the stars to behold me dining upon a half-penny-worth of radishes, my very companions were taught to beheve that I liked salad better than mutton I contented myself with thinking, that all my life I should either eat white bread or brown, considered that all that happened was best, laughed when I was not in pain, took the world as it went, and read Tacitus often for want of more books and company

"How long I might have continued in this torpid state of simplicity I cannot tell, had I not been roused by seeing an old acquaintance, whom I knew to be a prudent blockhead, profeired to a place in the government I now found that I had pursued a wrong track, and that the true way of being able to reheve others was first to aim at independence myself my immediate care, therefore, was to leave my present habitation and make an entire reformation in my conduct and behaviour. For a free, open, undesigning deportment, I put on that of closeness, prudence, and economy One of the most heroic actions I ever performed, and for which I shall praise myself as long as I live, was the refusing half-a-crown to an old acquaintance, at the time when he wanted it, and I had it to spare for this alone I deserve to be decreed an ovation.

"I now therefore pursued a course of uninterrupted frugality, seldom wanted a dinner, and was con ecquently invited to twenty. I soon began to get the character of a caving hunds that had money, and insensibly grew into esteem. Neighbours have asked my advice in the disposal of their daughters, and I have always taken care not to give any. I have contracted a frendship with an alderman, only by observing, that if we take a farthing from a thousand pounds, it will be a thousand pounds no longer I have been invited to a prembroker's table, by pre tending to hate gravy; and am now actually upon treaty of marriage with a rich widow, for only having observed the the bread was rising If ever I am asked a question, whether I know it or not, instead of answering, I only smile and look wise If a charity is proposed, I go about with the hat, but put nothing in myself If a wretch solicits my pity I observe that the world is filled with impostors, and tal e a certain method of not being deceived by never relieving In short, I now find the truest way of finding esteem, even from the indigent, is to give away nothing, and thus have much in our power to mvə."

XVIII.

THE PERFECTION OF THE CHINFSE IN GARDFNING THE GARDENS OF VIRTUE AND VICE

THE English have not yet brought the art of gardening to the same perfection with the Chinese, but have lately began to imitate them. Nature is now followed with greater assiduity than formerly the trees are suffered to shoot out into the utmost luxuriance, the streams, no longer forced from their native beds, are permitted to wind along the valleys, spontaneous flowers take the place of the finished partorre, and the enamelled meadow of the shaven green

709

Yet still the English are far behind us in this charming art their designers have not yet attained the power of uniting instruction with beauty. A European will scarcely conceive my meaning, when I say that there is scarce a garden in China which does not contain some fine moral, couched under the general design, where one is taught wisdom as he walks, and feels the force of some noble truth, or deboate piecept, resulting from the dispositions of the groves, streams, or grottos. Permit me to illustrate what I mean by a description of my gardens at Quams: My heart still hovers round those scenes of former happiness with pleasure, and I find a satisfaction in enjoying them at this distance, though but in imagination

You descended from the house between two groves of trees, planted in such a manner, that they were impenetrable to the eye, while on each hand the way was adorned with all that was beamful in poscelam, statuary, and painting This passage from the house opened into an area surrounded with nacks, flowers, trees and shribs, but ill so disposed is if each was the spontaneous production of nature As you proceeded forward on this lawn, to your night and left hand were two gates, opposite each other, of very different architecture and design, and before you lay a temple, built with rather minute elegance than estenation

The right hand gate was planned with the utmost simplicity, or rather rudeness: ivy classed round the

10%

sequently invited to twenty I soon began to get the character of a saving hunks that had money, and insensibly grew into esteem Neighbours have asked my advice in the disposal of their daughters; and I have always taken care not to give any. I have contracted a frendship with an alderman, only by observing, that if we take a furthing from a thousand pounds, it will be a thousand pounds no longer I have been invited to a pawnbroker's table, by pretending to hate gravy, and am now actually upon treaty of marriage with a nich widow, for only having observed the, the bread was rising If ever I am asked a question, whether I know it or not, mstead of answering, I only simile and look wise If a charity is proposed, I go about with the hat, but put nothing in myself If a wretch solicits my pity I observe that the world is filled with impostors, and tuke a certain method of not being deceived by never relieving In short, I now find the truest way of finding esteem, even from the indigent, is to give away nothing, and thus have much in our power to give."

хүш

THE GARDENS OF VIPTUE AND VICE

The English have not yet brought the art of gaidening to the same perfection with the Chinese, but have lately begun to imitate them. Nature is now followed with greater assiduity than formerly the trees are suffered to shoot out into the utmost luxunance, the streams, no longer forced from TVIII] THE GARDENS OF VIRTUE AND VICE 109

their native beds, are permitted to wind along the valleys, spontaneous flowers take the place of the finished parterie, and the enamelled meadow of the shaven green.

Yet still the Enghsh are far behind us in this charming at their designers have not yet attained the power of uniting instruction with beauty. A European will scuredly conceive my meaning, when I say that there is scarce a garden in China which does not contain some fine moral, couched under the general design, where one is taught wisdom as he walks, and feels the force of some noble truth, or delicate precept, resulting from the dispositions of the groves, streams, or grottes. Permit me to illustrate what I mean by a description of my gardens at Quamsi My heart still hovers round those scenes of former happiness with pleasure, and I find a satisfaction in enjoying them at this distance, though but in imagination

You descended from the house between two groves of trees, planted in such a manner, that they were impenetrable to the eye, while on each hand the way was adorned with all that was beautiful in potcelain, statuary, and printing. This presige from the house opened into an area surrounded with rocks, flowers, trees and shrubs, but all so disposed is if each was the spontaneous production of nature. As you proceeded forward on this lawn, to your right and left hand were two gates, opposite each other, of very different architecture and design, and before you lay a temple, built with rather minute degance than estentation.

The right hand gate was planned with the utmost simplicity, or rather rudeness my clasped round the seemed to have destroyed all the smoothness and regularity of the stone, two champions, with lifted clubs, appeared in the act of guarding its access! diagons and serpents were seen in the most hideous attitudes, to deter the spectator from ap proaching, and the perspective view that hy belind seemed dark and gloomy to the last degree, the stranger was tempted to enter only from the motto,

The opposite gate was formed in a very different manner, the architecture was light, elegant, and inviting flowers hung in wreaths round the pillars, all was finished in the most exact and masterly manner, the very stone of which it was built still preserved its polish, nymphs, wrought by the hand of a master, in the most alluring attributes,

110

-Pervia Virturi

entertainment

beckoned the stranger to approach, while all that lay behind, as far as eye could reach, seemed gay, luxurant, and capable of affording endless pleasure The motto itself contributed to invite him; for over the gate were written these words-Facilis DESCENSUS By this time I fancy you begin to perceive that the gloomy gate was designed to represent the road to Vntue, the opposite the more agreeable passage to Vice It is but natural to suppose, that the spectator was always tempted to enter by the gate which offered him so many allurements I always found that he took to the left, which promised most Immediately upon his entering the gate of Vice the trees and flowers were disposed in such a manner

m these cases left him to his choice, but generally

XVIII ] THE GARDENS OF VIRTUE AND VICE 111

as to make the most pleasing impression, but, as he walked farther on, he meensibly found the garden assume the nn of a wilderness—the landscapes began to darken—he appeared to go downwards—frightful rocks seemed to hang over his headgloomy caverns, unexpected precipices, awful rums, heaps of unburned bones, and terrifying sounds, caused by unseen waters, began to take the place of what at first appeared so lovely, it was in vain to attempt returning, the labying his was too much perplexed for any but myself to find the way back. In short, when sufficiently impressed with the horrors of what he saw, and the imprudence of his choice, I brought him by a hidden door a shorter way back into the area from whence at first he had strayed

The gloomy gate now presented itself before the stranger, and though there seemed little in its appearance to tempt his curiosity, yet, encouraged by the motto, he gradually proceeded The darkness of the entrance, the frightful figures that seemed to obstruct his way, the trees of a mounful green, con spired at first to disgust him as he went forward, however, all began to open and wear a more pleasing appearance, beautiful cascides, beds of flowers, trees loaded with fruit or blo-soms, and unexpected brooks, improved the scene, he now found that he was ascending, and as he proceeded all nature grew more beautiful the prospect widened as he went higher, even the air itself seemed to become more pure Thus, pleased and happy from unexpected beauties, I at last led him to an arbour, from whence he could view the garden and the whole country around, and where he might own, that the road to Virtue terminated in hammes

"At length, however, an unhappy youth, more aspining than the rest, undertook to climb the mountain's side and examine the summits which were littlet of deemed inaccessible. The inhabitants from below gazed with wonder at his interpublity, some applicated his courage, others censured his folly still, however, he proceeded towards the place where the earth and heavens seemed to unite, and at length arrived at the wished-for height with extreme labour and assiduity.

"His first surprise was to find the skies not, as he expected, within his reach, but still as far off as before. His amazement necessed when he saw wide extended region lying on the opposite side of the mountain, but it iose to astonishment when he beheld a country, at a distance, more beautiful and alluring than even that he had just left behind

"As he continued to gaze with wonder, a Genius with a look of infinite modesty, approaching, offered to be his guide and instructor 'The distant country which you so much admire,' says the angelic being, 'is called the LAND OF CERTAINTY in that chairing retreat sentiment contributes to refine every sensual banquet, the unhabitants are blessed with every solid enjoyment, and still more blessed in a perfect consciousness of their own felicity ignorance in that country is wholly unknown, all there is satisfaction without alloy, for every pleasure first undergoes the examination of reason. As for me, I am called the Genius of Demonstration, and am stationed here in order to conduct every adventurer to that land of happiness, through those intervening regions you see overhung with fogs and darkness, and horrid with forests, cataracts, caveins, and various other shapes of danger. But follow me, and in time I may lead you to that distant desirable land of tranquality.

"The intrand traveller imprediately put himself

"The intrepid traveller immediately put himself under the direction of the Genius, and both journeying on together with a slow but agreeable pace, deceived the tediousness of the way by conversation The beginning of the journey seemed to promise true satisfaction, but, as they proceeded forward, the skies became more gloomy and the way more intricate, they often madvertently approached the brow of some frightful precipice, or the brink of a torrent, and were obliged to measure back their former way . the gloom increasing as they proceeded, their pace became more slow, they paused at every step, frequently stumbled, and their distrust and timidity increased The Genius of Demonstration now therefore advised his pupil to grope upon hands and feet, as a method, though more slow, yet less liable to error

"In this manner they attempted to pursue their journey for some time, when they were overtaken by another Genus, who with a precipitate pace seemed travelling the same way. He was instantly known by the other to be the Genus of Probability. He wors two wide-extended wings at his back, which accessantly waved, without increasing the rapidity of his motion, his countenance betrayed a confidence that the ignorant might mistake for sincerity, and he had but one eye, which was fixed in the middle of his forchead.

"'Servant of Hormida," cried be, approaching the moital pilgrim, 'if thou art travelling to the LAND OF CERTAINTY, how is it possible to arrive there under the guidance of a Gemus who proceeds forward so slowly, and as so little acquainted with the way? Follow me, we shall soon perform the journey to where every pleasure write our arrival?

"The peremptory tone in which this Genius spoke, and the speed with which he moved forward, induced the traveller to change his conductor, and leaving his modest companion behind, he proceeded forward with his more confident director, scenning not a little pleased at the increased velocity of his motion.

"But soon he found re son to repent Whenever a torrent crossed their way, his guide taught him to despise the obstacle by plunging him in; whenever a precipice presented, he was directed to fling himself forward. Thus each moment impreciping, his repeated escapes only served to increase his guide's temerity. He led him, therefore, for ward, amidst infinite difficulties, till they arrived at the borders of an ocean, which appeared unnavigable from the black musts that hy upon its suffice. Its unquiet waves were of the darkest hime, and gave a lively representation of the various agitation of the lumpan mind.

"The Genus of Probability now confessed his tementy, owned his being an improper guide to the LAND OF CERTAINTY, a country where no mortal had even been permitted to arrive, but, at the same time, offered to supply the traveller with another conductor, who should earry him to the LAND OF CONTIDENCE, a region where the inhabitant's lived with the atmost tranquibity, and to tool almost us much satisfaction as if in the LAND OF CENTAINTY Not vaiting for "reply, he stamped three times on the effected what other means could not perform. For now he heard himself welcomed on every side to the promised bind, and an universal shout of joy was sent forth at his safe arrival. The wearied traveller, desirous of seeing the long wished-for country, at length pulled the fillet from his eyes, and ventured to look round him. But he had unloosed the band too soon, he was not yet above half way over. The Demon, who was still hovering in the air, and had produced those sounds only in order to deceave, was now freed from his commission, wherefore, throwing the astonished traveller from his back, the unbappy youth fell headlong into the subjected to deceave to nothers, from whence he never after was seen to 1150.

XΧ

EXCELLENCE OF BRITISH JUSTICE

WHEN Paimenic, the Grecian, had done something which exacted a universal shout from the surrounding multitude, he was instantly struck with the doubt, that what had their approbation must centamly be wrong, and turning to a philosophet who stood near him, "Pray, sn;" says he, "gardon me, I fear I have been guilty of some absurdity"

You know that I am, not less than him, a depaser of the multitude, you know that I equally detest flattery to the great, yet so many circumstances have concurred to give a lustre to the latter part of the present English monach's reign, that I cannot avoid acknowledging the crowd, for once, just in their manimous approbation

Yet think not that battles gained, dominion extended, or enemies brought to submission, are the virtues which at present claim my admiration Were the reigning monarch only famous for his victories, I should regard his character with indufference the boast of heroism in this enlightened age is justly regarded as a qualification of a very subordinate rank, and mankind how begin to look with becoming horror on these fees to man The virtue in this aged monarch which I have at present in view is one of a much more exalted nature, is one of the most difficult attainment, is the least praised of all kingly virtues, and yet deserves the greatest praise, the virtue I mean is Justice administration of justice, without severity and without favour

Of all virtues this is the most difficult to be practised by a king who has a power to pardon All men, even tyrants themselves, lean to mercy when unbiassed by passions or interest, the heart naturally persuades to forgiveness, and pursuing the dictates of this pleasing deceiver, we are led to prefer our private satisfaction to public utility. What a thorough love for the public, what a strong command over the passions, what a finely-conducted judgmout, must be possess, who opposes the dictates of reason to those of his heart, and prefers the future interest of his people to his own immediate satisfaction 1

If still to a man's own intural bias for tenderness we add the numerous solicitations made by a climinal's friends for mercy, if we survey a king not only opposing his own feelings, but reluctantly refusing those he regards, and this to satisfy the public, whose cires he may never hear, whose graintude he may never receive, this smely is true greatness! Let us finney ourselves for a moment in this just old man's place! surrounded by numbers all schedung the same favour—a favour that nature disposes us to grant, where the inducements to pity are laid before us in this strongest light, supplyinds at our feet, some ready to resent a refusal, none opposing a compliance, let us, I say, suppose ourselves in such a structure, and I frusy we should find ourselves more upt to act the character of good natured men them of upright magniturates.

What contributes to ruse justice above all other kingly vartues is, that it is seldom attended with a due share of applaine, and those who practise it must be influenced by greater motives than empty fame the people are generally well pleased with a remission of punishment, and all that wears the appearance of humanity, it is the was alone who are capable of discerning that imputatel justice is the truest mercy thoy know it to be very difficult to once to compassionate, and yet condemn, in object that pleads for tenderness

I have been led into this commonplace trum of thought by a lite striking instance in this country of the impartiality of justice, and of the king's inflorible resolution of inflicting punishment where it was justly due A man of the first quality, in a fit either of passion, melancholy, or madness murdered his secrant it was expected that his station in life would have lessened the ignorancy of his punishment, however, he was arrugued, condemned and undiracent the same degrading death with the meanest mulefactor. It was well considered that virtue alone is true nobility, and that he, whose actions sink him even beneath the vulgar, has no right to those distinctions which should be the rewards only of ment it was perhaps considered that crimes were more hemous among the higher classes of people, as necessity exposes them to fewer temptations

Over all the East, even China not excepted, a person of the same quality, guilty of such a crime, might by giving up a share of his fortune to the judge, buy off his sentence. There are several countiles, even in Europe, where the servant is entirely the property of his master if a slave kills his lord, he dies by the most excruciating tortules, but if the circumstances are reversed, a small fine buys off the punishment of the offender Happy the country where all are equal and where those who sit as judges have too much integrity to receive a bribe, and too much honour to pity, from a similitude of the prisoner's title or circumstances with their own ! Such is England: yet think not that it was always equally famed for this strict impartiality. There was a time, even here, when title softened the rigours of the law, when dignified wietches were suffered to live, and continue for years an equal disgrace to justice and nobility

To this day, in a neighbouring country, the great are often most scandalously pardoned for the most scandalous offences A person is still alive among them who has more than once descrived the most ignominious severity of justice. His being of the blood royal, however, was thought a sufficient atonement for his being a disgrace to humanity This remarkable personage took aleasure in shooting at the passengers from the top of his palace, and in this most princely amusement he usually spent some time every day. He was at length arranged by the friends of a person whom in this manner he had killed, was found guilty of the charge, and condemned to die. His merciful monaich paidoned him, in consideration of his rank and quality. The unrepenting criminal soon after renewed his usual entertainment, and in the same manuel killed another man He was a second time condemned, and, strange to think, a second time received his majesty's pardon! Would you believe it! A third time the very same man was guilty of the very same offence a third time, therefore, the laws of his country found him guilty-I wish, for the honour of humanity, I could suppress the rest-a third tame he was paidoned! Will you not think such a story too extraordinary for belief? Will you not think me describing the savage inhabitants of Congo? Alas! the story is but too true, and the country where it was transacted regards itself as the politest in Europe !- Adieu

XXI.

UNGLISH LIBERTY

Ask an Englishman what nation in the world enjoys most freedom, and he immediately answers, his own Ask him in what that freedom principally consists, and he is instantly silent. This happy preemmence does not arree from the people's enjoying a larger share in legislation than elsewhere, for in this particular several states in Europe excel them, nor does it arise from a greater exemption from taxes, for few countries pay more, it does not proceed from their being restrained by fewer laws, for no people are burdened with so many, nor does it particularly consist in the security of their property, for property is pretty well secured in every polite state in Europe

How, then, are the English more free—for more free they certainly are—than the people of any other country, or under any other form of government whatever? Their freedom consists in their enjoying all the advantages of democracy, with this superior preognitive borrowed from monarchy, that the seventy of their laws may be iclased without endangering the constitution

In a monarchical state, in which the constitution is strongest, the laws may be relaxed without danger, for though the people should be unanmous in the breach of any one in particular, yet still there is an effective power superior to the people, capable of enforcing obedience, whenever it may be proper to inculcate the law either towards the support or welfare of the community

But in all those governments where laws derive their sanction from the people alone, transgressions cannot be overlooked without bringing the constitution into danger. They who transgress the law in such a case are those who prescribe it, by which means it loses not only its influence, but its sanction In every republic the laws must be strong, because the constitution is feeble, they must resemble an Asiatic husband, who is justly jealous, because be knows himself impotent. Thus, in Holland, Switzerland, and Genoa, now laws are not frequently enacted, but the old ones are observed with unremitting sevenity. In such republics, therefore, the people are slaves to laws of their own making, little less than in unusued monarchies, where they are slaves to the will of one subject to imilitie, like themselves.

In England, from a variety of happy accidents, their constitution is just strong enough, or, if you will, monachical enough, to permit a relaxation of the severity of laws, and yet those laws still to remain sufficiently strong to govern the people. This is the most perfect state of civil library of which we cun form any idea, here we see a greater number of laws than in any other country while the people at the same time obey only such as are immediately conducate to the interests of sometry, several are unnoticed, many unknown, some kept to be revived and enforced upon proper occasions, others left to grow obsolete, even without the necessity of abrogation.

There is scarcely an Englishman who does not almost every day of his life offiend with impunity against some express law, and for which, in a certum conjuncture of exeumstances, he would not receive punishment. Gaming-houses, preaching at prohibited places, assembled crowds, noctumal amisements, public shows, and a limited other instances, are fooled and frequented. These prohibitions are useful, though it be prudent in their magistrates, and happy for the people, that they are not enfanced, and none but the vanid or new country attempt to enforce them.

The law in this case, like an indulgent parent, still keeps the rod, though the child is seldom corrected Were those pardoned offences to rise into enormity, were they likely to obstruct the happiness of society, or endanger the state, it is then that justice would resume her teriors, and punish those faults she had so often overlooked with indulgence It is to this ductility of the laws that an Englishman owes the freedom he enjoys superior to others in a more popular government. every step. therefore, the constitution takes toward a democratic form every diminution of the regal authority, is, in fact, a diminution of the subject's freedom but every attempt to render the government more popular not only impairs natural liberty, but even will at last dissolve the political constitution

Every popular government seems calculated to last only for a time it glows rigid with rage, new laws are multiplying, and the old continue in force , the subjects are oppressed, buildened with a multiplicity of legal injunctions, there are none from whom to expect redress, and nothing but a strong convulsion in the state can vindicate them into former liberty thus the people of Rome, a few great ones excepted, found more real freedom under their emperors, though tyrants, than they had experienced in the old age of the commonwealth, in which their laws were become numerous and painful, in which new laws were every day enacting, and the old ones executed with rigour They even refuse to be reinstated in their former prerogatives, upon an offer made them to this purpose, for they actually found emperors the only meens of softening the rigours of their constitution

The constitution of England is at present possessed of the strength of its native oak and the fleatbility of the bending tamurisk; but should the people at any time, with a mistaken zeal, pint

the fleathlity of the bending tamerisk; but should the people at any time, with a mistaken wal, pint after an imaginary freedom, and fancy that abridging monarchy was increasing these privileges, they would be very much mistaken, since every jewed plucked from the crown of majesty would only be made use of as a bribe to corruption, it might would in fact unpoverish the public, degrees, became masters of the people, yet still flattered them with a show of freedom, while themselves only write free so it is possible for a body of men, while they stand up for purileges, to grow into an esuberruce of power themselves, and the public become actually dependent, while some of its individuals only govern enrich the few who shared it among them, but

As the Roman cenators, by slow and imperceptible

If then, my friend, there should in this country ever be on the throne a king who, through good nature or use, should give up the smillest put of his principal coince a minister of merit and popularity—but I have room for no more—Admi.

IIXX

THE PHILOSOPHER IS VISITED BY A BOOKSELLER

As I was yesterday seated at breakfast over a pensive dish of tea, my meditations were interrupted by my old finend and companion, who introduced a stranger dressed pretty much like himself. The gontleman made several apologies for his visit, begged of me to impute his intrusion to the sincerity of his respect and the warmth of his curiosity.

As I am very suspectous of my company when I find them very civil without any apparent reason, I answered the stranger's carosess at first with reserve, which my friend perceiving, instantly let me into my visitant's trade and character, asking Mr Fudge, whether he had lately published anything new? I now conjectured that my guest was no other than a bookseller, and his answer confirmed my suspicions

"Excuse me, sir," says he, "it is not the serson, books have their time as well as encumbers. I would no more bring out a new work in summer, than I would sell pork in the dog days. Nothing in my way goes off in summer, except very light goods indeed. A review, a magazine, or a sessions paper, may anuse a summer reader, but all our stock of value we reserve for a spring and winter trade." "I must confess, sir," said I, "a curiosity to know what you call a valuable stock, which can only bear a winter perusal."—"Sir," replied the bookseller. "it is not my way to cry up my own goods, but published?" cried I -" Sir, the book was published in order to be sold, and no book sold better, except the criticisms upon it, which came out soon after of all kinds of writing, that goes off best at present, and I generally fasten a criticism upon every selling book that is published "I once had an author who never left the least opening for the critics close was the word, always very right and very dull, ever on the safe side of an argument, yet, with all his qualifications, incapable of coming into favour I soon perceived that his bent was for criticism, and, as he was good for nothing else, supplied him with pens and paper, and planted him, at the beginning of every month, as a censor on the works of others. In short I found him a treasure, no ment could escape him but what is most iemarkable of all, he ever wrote hest and bitterest when drunk "-" But are there not some works," interrupted I, "that, from the very manner of their composition, must be exempt from criticism, particularly such as profess to disregard its laws ?"-" There is no work whatsoever but he can criticise," ieplied the bookseller, "even though you wrote in Chinese, he would have a pluck at you Suppose you should take it into your head to publish a book, let it be a volume of Chinese letters, for instance, write how you will, he shall show the world you could have written better Should you, with the most local exactness, stick to the manners and customs of the dountry from whence you come. should you confine yourself to the namow limits of Eastern knowledge, and be perfectly simple and perfectly natural, he has then the strongest reason

YXII THE PHILOSOPHER AS A BOOKSELLER 131 to exclaim. He may, with a sneer, send you back to China for readers He may observe that, after the first or second letter, the iteration of the same tude"-"What su!" replied I, "put my name to a work which I have not written? Never! while I netum a proper nespect for the public and myself" The bluntness of my reply quite abated the ardour of the bookseller's conversation, and, after about half an hour's disagreeable reserve, he, with some cere mony, took his leave and withdraw -- Adien simplicity is insupportably tedious; but the worst of all is, the public, in such a case, will anticipate his censures, and leave you, with all your uninstructive simplicity, to be mauled at discretion " "Yes," cried I, "but in order to avoid his indignation, and, what I should fear more, that of the public, I would, in such a case, write with all the knowledge I was master of As I am not possessed of much learning, at least I would not suppress what little I had; not would I appear more stupid than nature has made me."—" Here, then," cries the bookseller, "we should have you entirely in our power unuatural, un-Eistern, quite out of character, erroneously sensible, would be the whole cry Sur, we should then hunt you down like a rat."-"Head of my father!" sud I, "sure there are but two ways, the door must either be shut or it must be open. I must either be natural or unnatural "-"Be what you will, we shall criticise you," returned the bookseller, "and prove you a dunce in spite of your teeth But, sir, it is time I should come to business I have just now in the piess a history of China, and if you will but put your name to it as the author, I shall pay the obligation with grati-

HIXX

THE PRESENT SITUATION OF THE SEVERAL STATES OF EUROPE

Tun distant sounds of music, that eatch new sweetness as they vibrate through the long-drawn valley, are not more pleasing to the ear than tidings of a far distant friend

I have just received two hundred of thy letters by the Russian caravan, descriptive of the manners of Europe You have left it to geographers to determine the site of their mountains and extent of their lakes, seeming only employed in discovering the genus, the government, and disposition of the people

In those letters I peaceive a journal of the operations of your mind upon whatever occurs, rather than a detail of your travels from one building to another of your training a draft of this ruin, or that obelokly of paying so many tomans for this commodity, or laying up a proper store for the passage of some new wilderness.

From your accounts of Russia, I learn that this nation is again relaxing into private butbrity; that its great emperor wanted a life of an hundred years more to bring about his tast designs. A savage people may be resembled to their own focests, a few years are sufficient to clear away the obstructions to agriculture, but it requires many eiche ground acquires a proper degree of ferthlity the Russins, attached to their ancient prejudices, aguin renew their listed to strangers, and indulge every former brutal excess. So true it is, that the revolutions of wisdom are slow and difficult, the levolutions of folly or ambition precipitate and easy "We are not to be astonished," any Confucius, "that the wise walk more slowly in their road to virtue, than fools in their passage to vice, since passion diags us along, while wisdom only points the war."

The German empire, that remnant of the majesty of ancient Rome, appears, from your accounts, on the eve of dissolution. The members of its vast body want every tie of government to unite them, and seem feebly held together only by then respect for ancient institutions. The very name of country and countrymen, which in other nations makes one of the strongest bonds of government, has been here for some time laid aside, each of its inhabitant's essuing more proud of being called from the petty state which gives him birth than by the well-known table of German.

This government may be regarded in the light of a severe master and a feeble opponent. The states which are now subject to the laws of the empire, are only watching a proper occasion to fing off the yoke, and those which are become too powerful to be compelled to obedience, now begin to think of dictating in them turn. The struggles in this state are, therefore, not in order to preserve, but to destroy, the ancient constitution, if one sade succeeds, the government must become despote, if the other, several states will subsist, without even nominal subordination but in either case the Germanic constitution will be no more

Sweden, on the contrary, though now seemingly

a strenuous assertor of its liberties, is probably only hastening on to despotism. Then senators while they pretend to vindicate the freedom of the people, are only establishing their own independence. The deladed people will, however, at last perceive the miseries of an aristociatical government, they will perceive that the administration of a society of men is ever more painful than that of one only They will fly from this most oppressive of all forms, where one single member is capable of controlling the whole, to take refuge under the throne, which will ever be attentive to their complaints. No people long endure an aristocratical government, when they can apply elsewhere for redress. The lower orders of people may be enslaved for a time by a number of tyrants, but, upon the first opportunity, they will ever take a refuge in despotism or democracy As the Swedes are making concealed approaches

As the Sweles are making concealed approaches to despotem, the French, on the other brand, are imperceptably vindicating themselves into freedom When I consider that those pulliments (the members of which are all created by the court, the presidents of which can act only by immediate direction) preturns even to mention privileges and freedom, who, till of late, received instruction to those with implicit humility, when this is considered, I cannot help fancying that the genius of freedom has entered that longdom in disguise. If they have but these work monarchs more successively on the throne, the much will be laid aside, and the country will once more be

When I compare the figure which the Dutch

make in Europe with that they assume in Asia, I am struck with surprise In Asia, I find them the great lords of all the Indian seas; in Europe, the timed inhabitants of a paltry state. No longer the sons of freedom, but of avarice, no longer assentors of their rights by courage, but by negotiations, fawning on those who insult them, and crouching under the rod of every neighbouring power. Without a friend to save them in distress, and without virtue to save themselves, their government is poor, and their private wealth will serve but to invite some neighbouring myader

I long with impatience for your letters from England, Denmark, Holland, and Italy? yet why wish for relations which only describe new culamities, which show that ambition and avarice are equally terrible in every region I—Adreu.

XXIV.

LESSONS TO A YOUTH ENTERING THE WORLD

The news of your freedom lifts the load of former anxiety from my mind, I can now think of my son without regret, applaud his resignation under calamities, and his conduct in extricating himself from them

You are now free, just let loose from the bondage of a hard master this is the crisis of your fate, and as you now manage fortune, succeeding life will be marked with hoppiness or misery. A few years' perseverance in prudence, which at your age is but another name for virtue, will ensure comfort, pleasure, tranquility, esteems, too cager an enjoyment of every good that now offers will reverse the medal, and pre-ent you with powerty, anxiety, remorse, contempt

As it had been observed, that none are better qualified to give others advice, than those who have taken the least of it themselves, so in this respect I find myself perfectly authorised to offer mine, even though I should waive my paternal authority upon this occasion

The most usual way among young men who have no resolution of their own is, first to ask one friend's advice, and follow it for some time, then to ask advice of another, and turn to that, so of a third still unsteady, always changing However, be assured, that every change of this nature is for the worse people may tell you of your being unfit for some peculiar occupations in life, but heed them not, whatever employment you follow with persevertuce and assiduity will be found fit for you, it will be your support in youth, and comfort in age In learning the useful part of every profession very moderate abilities will suffice, even if the mind be a little balanced with simpidity, it may in this case be useful. Great abilities have always been less serviceable to the possessors than moderate ones Life has been compared to a lace, but the allusion still improves by observing, that the most swift are ever the least manageable

To know one profession only, is enough for one man to know, and this (whatever the professors may tell you to the contrary) is soon learned. Be contented, therefore, with one good employment, for if you undertake two at a time, people will give you business in neither

A conjurer and a tailor once happened to converse together "Alas !" cres the tailor, "what an unhappy poor creature am I, if people should ever take it in their heads to live without clothes I am undone . I have no other trade to have recourse to" -" Indeed, friend, I pity you sincerely," replied the conjurer , "but, thank Heaven, things are not quite so bad with me, for if one trick should fail, I have a hundred tricks more for them yet However, if at any time you are reduced to beggary, apply to me, and I will relieve you" A famine overspread the land, the tailor made a shift to live, because his customers could not be without clothes, but the poor conjurer, with all his hundred tricks, could find none that had money to throw away it was in vain that he promised to get hire, or to vomit pins, no single creature would relieve him, till he was at last obliged to beg from the very tailor whose calling he had to merly despised

There are no obstructions more fital to fortune than pide and resentment. If you must resent unjuries at all, at least suppress your indignation until you become rich, and then show away the resentment of a poor man is like the efforts of a harmless insect to sting, it may get him croshed, but cannot defend him. Who values that anger which is consumed only in empty menaces?

Once upon a time a goose fed its young by a pond side, and a goose, in such encountances, is always extingly pound, and excessively punctilious. If any other animal, without the least design to offend, happened to pass that way, the goose was im mediately at him. The pond, she said, was hers, and she would maintain a right in it, and support her honour, while she had a bill to hiss, or a wing to flutter. In this manner she drove away ducks, pigs, and chickens, nay, even the insidious cat was seen to scamper A lounging mastiff, however, happened to pass by, and thought it no harm if he should lap a little of the water, as he was thirsty The guardian goose flew at him like a fury, pecked at him with her beak, and flapped him with her feathers The dog grew augis, and had twenty times a good mind to give her a sly snap, but suppressing his indignation, because his master was nigh, "Plague take thee," cries he, "for a fool! sure those who have neither strength nor weapons to fight, at least should be civil that fluttering and hissing of thine may one day get thine head snapped off, but it can neither injure thy enemies, not ever protect thee" So saying, he went forward to the pond, quenched his thirst in spite of the goose, and followed his master.

Another obstruction to the fortune of youth is, that while they are willing to take offence from none, they are also equally desirous of giving nobody offence. From hence they endeavour to please all, comply with every request, attempt to suit them solves to every compling, have no will of their own, but, like wax, eith every contiguous impression. By thus attempting to give universal satisfaction, they at last find themselves miserably disappointed to bring the generality of admires on our side, it is sufficient to attempt pleasing a very few.

A number of commence was once is evolved to finish

A painter of eminence was once resolved to finish a piece which should please the whole world When, therefore, he had drawn a picture, in which his utmost skill was exhausted, it was exposed in the public market-place, with directions at the hottom for every spectator to mark with a brush, which lay by, every limb and feature which seemed erroneous. The spectators came, and in general applauded, but each, willing to show his talent at criticism, marked whatever he thought proper At evening, when the painter came, he was mortified to find the whole picture one universal blot-not a single stroke that was not stigmatized with marks of disapprobation not satisfied with this trial, the next day he was resolved to try them in a different manner, and. exposing his picture as before, desired that every spectator would mark those beauties he approved or admired The people complied; and the artist returning, found his picture replete with the marks of beauty every stroke that had been yesterday condemned, now received the character of approbation, "Well," cries the painter, "I now find that the best way to please one half of the world, is not to mind what the other half says, since what are faults in the eyes of these, shall be by those regarded as beauties "-Adieu.

XXV

THE GREAT EXCHANGE HAPPINESS FOR SHOW

The plances of Europe have found out a manner of rewarding their subjects who have behaved well, by presenting them with about two yards of blue riband, which is worn about the shoulder. They who are honoured with this mark of distinction are called Laughts, and the king humself is always the head of the order The is a very frugal method of recompensing the most important services, and it is very fortunate for kings that their subjects are estisfied with such fulling rewards. Should a nobleman happen to lose his log in a battle, the king presents him with two yards of riband, and he is paid for the loss of his lumb. Should an unbassador spend all his paternal fortune in supporting the honom of his country abroad, the Ling presents him with two yards of riband, which is to be considered as an equivalent to his estate In short, while an European king has a yard of blue or green riband left, he need be under no apprehensions of wanting statesmon, generals, and amhloa I cannot sufficiently admire those kingdoms in which men with large prinimental estates are willing thus to undergo real hardships for empty favour. A person, already possessed of a competent fortune, who undertakes to enter the career of ambition, feels many real inconveniences from his station, while it procures him no real happiness that he was not possessed of before. He could cut, drink, and sleep, before he became a courtier, as well, peshaps befter, than when invested with his authority. He could command flatterers in a private station, as well as in his public capacity, and multige at home every favourite inclination, unconsisted and unseen by the people.

What real good, then, does an addition to a fortune already sufficient procure? Not any

Could the great man, by having his fortune increased, increase also his appetites, then precedence might be attended with real amusement

Was he, by having his one thousand made two, thus enabled to enjoy two waves, or cut two dinners, then indeed he might be excused for undergoing some plain in order to extend the sphere of his enjoyments. But, on the contrary, he finds his desire for pleasure often lessen, as he takes pains to be able to improve it, and his capacity of enjoyment dimminshes as his fortune happens to increase.

Instead, therefore, of regarding the great with envy, I generally consider them with some share of compassion I look upon them as a set of goodnatured, misguided people, who are indebted to us, and not to themselves, for all the happiness they enjoy. For our pleasure, and not their own, they sweat under a cumbrous heap of finery, for our pleasure, the lacqueyed train, the slow-parading pageant, with all gravity of grandem, moves in review a single coat, on a single footman, answers all the purposes of the most indolent refinement as well, and those who have twenty, may be said to keep one for their own pleasure, and the other inneteen merely for ours. So true is the other numeteen merely for ours. So true is the observation of Confucing, "That we take greater pains to persuade others that we re happy, than in endeavouring to think so ourselves."

But though this desire of being seen, of being made the subject of discourse, and of supporting the dignities of an exalted station, be troublesome enough to the imbitious, yet it is well for society that there are men thus willing to exchange ease and safety for danger and a ribind. We lose nothing by their vanity, and it would be unkind to endeavour to deprive a child of its natile. If a duke or a duchess are willing to carry a long train for our entertainment, so much the worse for themselves, if they choose to exhibit in public, with a hundred lacqueys and mamelukes in their equipage, for our entertainment, still so much the worse for themselves, it is the speciators alone who give and receive the pleasure, they only are the sweating figures that swell the pageant

A mandarin, who took much pride in appearing with a number of jewels on every part of his robe, was once accosted by an old sly bonze, who, following him through several streets, and bowing often to the ground, thanked him for his jewels. What does the man mean?" cried the mandarin "Friend, I never gave thee any of my jewels."—"No," replied the other; "but you have let me look at them, and that is all the use you can make of them yourself, so there is no difference between us, except that you have the trouble of watching them, and that is an employment I don't much desire"—Adjeu

XXVI.

FORTUNE IS PLOVED TO BE NOT BLIND

THE Europeans are themselves blind, who describe Fortune without sight. No first-rate beauty ever had fine eyes, or saw more clearly they who have no other trade but seeking their fortune, need never hope to find her, coquette-like, she files from her pursuers, and at last fixes on the plodding mechanic, who stays at home, and minds his business

I am amazed how men call het blind, when, by the company she keeps, she seems so very di-cenning. Wherever you see a gaming-table, be very sure Fortune is not there, wherever you see a house with the doors open, be sure Fortune is not there, when you see a man whose pocket holes are laced with gold, be satisfied Fortune is not there wherever you see a beautiful woman good-natured and obliging, be convinced Fortune is never there. In short, she is ever seen accompanying industry, and as often trundling a wheelbarrow as lolling in a coach and six

If you would make Fortune your friend, or, to personize her no longer, if you desire, my son, to be nich, and have money, be more enger to save than acquire when people say, Money is to be got here, and money is to be got there, take no notice, mind your own business, stay where you are, and secure all you can get without sturing When you hear that your neighbour has picked up a purse of gold in the street, never run out into the same street. looking about you in order to pick up such another, on when you are informed that he has made a for tune in one branch of business, never change your own in order to be his rival. Do not desire to he uch all at once, but patiently add farthing to furthing Perhaps you despise the petty sum? and yet they who want a farthing, and have no friend that will lend them it, think faithings very good things Whang, the foolish miller, when he wanted a farthing in his distress, found that no friend would lend because they knew he wanted

Did you ever read the story of Whang in our books of Chinese learning? he who, despising small sums, and grasping at all, lost even what he had,

Whang, the miller, was naturally avarieous; no body loved money better than he, or more respected these that had it. When people would talk of a nich man in company, Whang would say, I know him very well, he and I have been long acquainted, he and I are internated, he shod for a child of mine, but if ever a poor man was mentioned, he had not the least knowledge of the man; he might be very well for aught he know, but he was not fond of many acquaintances, and loved to choose his own compuny

Whang, however, with all his eagerness for riches, was in reality poor, he had nothing but the profits of his mill to support him, but though these were small, they were certain, while his mill stood and went, he was sure of eating, and his frugality was such, that he every day laid some money by, which he would at intervals count and contemplate with much satisfaction. Yet still his acquisitions were not equal to his desires, he only found limited above want, whereas he desired to be possessed of affluence.

One day, as he was indulging these wishes, he was informed that a neighbour of his had found a pan of money under ground, having diseased of it three mights running before. These takings were daggers to the heart of poor Whang. "Here an I," says he, tooling and molting from morning to might for a few patry faithings, while neighbour Hunks only goes quietly to bed, and dreams himself into thoir sands before morning. Of that I could dream like him! with what pleasure would I dig round the pan, how slily would I carry it home, not even my wife should see me, and then, oh, the pleasure of thrusting one's arm into a heap of gold up to the elbow!" Such reflections only served to make the miller unhappy, he discontinued his former assiduity, he was quite disgusted with small gains, and his customers began to forsake him Every day he repeated the wish, and every night laid himself down in order to dream . Fortune, that was for a long time unkind, at last, however, seemed to smile upon his distresses, and indulged him with the wished-for vision. He dreamed that under a certain part of the foundation of his mill there was concealed a monstrous pan of gold and diamonds. buried deep in the ground, and covered with a large flat stone He rose up, thanked the stars that were at last pleased to take pity on his sufferings, and concealed his good luck from every person, as is usual in money dreams, in order to have the vision repeated the two succeeding nights, by which he should be certain of its veracity. His wishes in this also were answered, he still dreamed of the same pan of money, in the very same place

Now, therefore, it was past a doubt, so, getting up early the third morning, he repairs alone, with a mattock in his hand, to the mill, and began to undermme that part of the wall which the vision duccted. The first omen of success that he met was a broken mug digging still deeper, he turns up a house tile quite new and entire At last, after much digging, he came to the broad firt stone, but then so large, that it was beyond one man's strength to remove it L 2

"Here," cried he in napture, to him elf, "here it is under this stone those is room for a very large pur of diamonds indeed." I must c'en go home to my wife, and tell her the whole affair, and get her to assist me in tuning it up." Away therefore he goes, and acquaints his wife with every circum stance of their good fortune. Her raptures on this occasion may easily be imagined, she flew round his neck, and embriced him in an agony of 10), but those transports, however, did not deliy their eigerness to know the exact sum returning, therefore, speedily, together to the place where. Wheng had been digging, there they found—not indeed the expected tri issue, but the mill, their only support, under mined and fallen.—Adien

XXVII.

THE PREFERENCE OF GRACI TO BIATI.

I still, tem un at Teiki, where I have secented that money which was remitted here in order to release me from captority. My fair companion still improves in my esteem, the mole I know her mind, her beauty becomes more pagarant, she appears chaming, even among the daughters of Gircassan.

Yet, were I to examine her beauty with the art of a statuary, I should find numbers here that far surpass her, nature has not granted her all the borsted Carcassian regularity of feature, and yet she greatly exceeds the fanest of the country in the art of seving the affections "Whence," have I often and to-myself, "this resistless magic that attends

XXVII] PREFERENCE OF GRACE TO BEAUTY 147

even moderate charms? Though I regard the beautaes of the country with admiration, every interview weakens the impression, but the form of Zelis grows upon my imagination—I never behold her without an increase of tenderness and respect Whence this injustice of the mind, in preferring imperfect beauty to that which nature seems to have finished with care? Whence the infatuation that he, whom a comet could not amaze, should be astonished at a meteor?" When reason was thus integrated to find an answer, my imagination pursued the subject, and this was the result

I fancied myself placed between two landscapes, this called the Region of Beauty, and that the Valley of the Graces the one adorned with all that luxuriant nature could bestow, the fruits of various climates adoined the trees-the grove resounded with music-the gale breathed perfume-every charm that could arise from symmetry and exact distribution were here conspicuous—the whole offering a prospect of pleasure without end The Valley of the Graces, on the other hand, seemed by no means so inviting, the streams and the groves appeared just as they usually do in frequented countries no magnificent parteries, no concert in the grove, the rivulet was edged with weeds, and the rook joined its voice to that of the nightingale All was simplicity and nature

The most striking objects ever first alline the traveller I entered the Region of Bruty with microscot curiouty, and promised myself endless entistaction in being introduced to the pre-ding goddess. I perceived soveral of ringers, who entered with the same design, and what surprised me not a little was, to see several others hastening to leave this abode of seeming felicity.

After some fargue, I had at last the honour of being introduced to the goddess who represented Beauty in person. She was seated on a throne, at the foot of which stood several strangers, lately introduced like me, all regarding her form in extary

"Ah, what eyes! what lips! how clear her complexion! how perfect her shape!" At these exclamations Beauty, with downcast eyes, would endeavour to counterfect modesty, but soon again looking round as if to confirm every spectator in his favourable sentiments sometimes she would attempt to allune us by smiles, and at intervals would brille back, in order to inspire us with respect as well as tenderness

This ceremony lasted for some time, and had so much employed our eyes that we had forgot all this while that the goldess was silent. We soon, however, began to perceive the defect. "What," sad we, among each other, "are we to have nothing but languishing aus, soft looks, and inclinations of the head? Will the goldess only design to satisfy our eyes?" Upon this, one of the company stepped up to present her with some fruits he had gathered by the way. She received the present most sweetly similing, and with one of the whitest hands in the world, but still not a word escaped her lips.

I now found that my companions grew weary of their homage, they went off one by one, and resolving not to be left behind, I offered to go in my turn, when, just at the door of the temple. I was called back by a female whose name was Pride, and who seemed displeased at the behaviour of the company. "Where are you hastoning?" sud she to me with an angry air, "the goddess of Beauty is here"—"I have been to visit her, madam," replied I, "and find her more beautiful oven than report had

NAVII ] PREFERENCE OF GRACE TO BEAUTY 149

"and find her more beautiful even than report had made her."—"And why then will you leave her?" added the female.—"I live seen her long enough." returned I, "I have got all her features by heart Her eyes are still the same. Her nose is a very fine one, but it is still just such a nose now as it was half an hour ago could she throw a little more mund into her face, perhaps I should be for wishing to have more of her company"—"What signifies," replied my female, "whether she has a mind or not has she any occasion for a mind, so formed as she is by nature! If she had a common face, indeed, there might be some reason for thinking to improve it, but when features are already verfect, every alternative and the statement of the some reason for thinking to improve it, but when features are already verfect, every alternative and the statement of the sta has she any occasion for a mind, so formed as she is by nature? If she had a common face, indeed, there might be some reason for thinking to improve it, but when feriaires are already perfect, every alteration would but impair them. A fine face is already at the point of perfection, and a fine lady should endeavour to keep it so the impression it would receive from thought would but disturb its whole economy."

To this speech I gave no reply, but made the best of my way to the Valley of the Glaces. Here I of my way to the Valley of the Glaces. Here I found all those who before had been my companions in the Region of Beauty, now upon the same errand

As we entered the valley, the prospect insensibly

As we entered the valley, the prospect meensibly seemed to improve, we found everything so natural, so domestic, and pleasing, that our minds, which before were congested in admiration, now relaxed into gaiety and good-humour. We had designed to pay our respects to the presiding

XXVIII

ENGLISH SHOPS AND SHOPKEEPFRS.

THE shops of London are as well furnished as those of Pekin Those of London have a picture hung at their door, informing the passengers what they have to sell, as those at Pekin have a board to assure the buyer that they have no intent to cheat him

I was this morning to buy silk for a nightcap Immediately upon entering the mercer's shop, the master and his two men, with wigs plastered with powder, appeared to ask my commands They were certainly the civillest people alive, if I but looked. they flew to the place where I cast my eye, every motion of mine sent them running round the whole shop for my satisfaction I informed them that I wanted what was good, and they showed me not less than forty pieces, and each was the better than the former, the prettiest pattern in nature, and the fittest in the world for nightcaps "My very good friend," said I to the mercer, " you must not pretend to instruct me in silks , I know these in particular to be no better than your mere flimsy bungees "-"That may be," cried the mercer, who, I afterwards found, had never contradicted a man in his life "I cannot pretend to say but they may, but I can assure you, my Lidy Trail has had a sack from this piece this very morning "-"But, friend," said I. "though my lady has chosen a sack from it, I see no necessity that I should wear it for a nightcap" -"That may be," returned he agam, "yet what becomes a metty lady, will at any time look well on a handsome gentleman." This short compliment was thrown in so very seasonably upon my ugly face, that even though I dishked the silk, I deshed him to cut mo off the pattern of a nightcap

While this business was consigned to his journeyman, the master himself took down some pieces of silk still finer than any I had yet seen, and spreading them before me, "There," cries he, "there's a beauty, my Lord Snakeskin has bespoke the fellow to this for the birthnight this very morning, it would look charmingly in waisteeats"—"But I don't want a waisteeat," replied I. "Not want a waistcoat 1" returned the mercer. "then I would advise you to buy one, when waistcorts are wanted, you may depend upon it they will come dear Always buy before you want, and you are sure to be always well used, as they say in Cheapside" There was so much justice in his advice, that I could not refuse taking it; besides, the silk, which was really a good one, increased the temptation, so I gave orders for that too As I was waiting to have my burgains measured

As I was waiting to have my brigains measured and cut, which, I know not how, they executed but slowly, during the interval the mercer entertained me with the modern manner of some of the nobility receiving company in their morning gowns "Perlangs, sn;" adds he, "you have a mind to see what kind of silk is imversally won?" Without waiting for my reply, he spreads a piece before me, which might be reckoned beautiful oven in China "If the nobility," continues he, "were to know I sold this to any under a Right Honourable, I should certainly lose then custom, you see, my lord, it is at once rich, tasty, and quite the thing."—"I am no lord,"

zxvin ] ENGLISH SHOPS AND SHOPKEEPERS 153

interrupted I.—"I beg pandon," cried he, "but be pleased to 1 emember, when you intend buying a morning gown, that you had an offer from me of something worth money. Conscience, sii, conscience is my way of dealing, you may buy a morning gown now, or you may stay till they become dearer and less fashionable; but it is not my business to advise" In short, most reverend Fum, he persuaded me to buy a morning gown also, and would

and less fashionable; but it is not my business to advise" In short, most reverend Fum, he persuaded me to buy a morning gown also, and would probably have persuaded me to have bought half the goods in his shop if I had stayed long enough, or was furnished with sufficient money with some astomshment, how this very man, with such a confined education and capacity, was yet capable of turning me as he thought proper, and moulding me to his inclinations. I knew he was only answering his own purposes, even while he attempted to appear solicitous about mine yet, by a voluntary infatuation, a sort of passion, compounded of vanity and good nature, I walked into the snare with my eyes open, and put myself to fature pain in order to give him immediate pleasure. The wisdom of the ignorant somewhat resembles the instanct of animals, it is diffused in but a very narrow sphere, but within that errele it acts with vigour, uniformity and success.

Upon returning home, I could not help reflecting,

XXIX

THE EVIL OF INCREASING PENAL LAWS

I have always regarded the spirit of mercy which appears in the Chinese laws with admiration. An order for the execution of a criminal is carried from court by slow journeys of six miles a day, but a pardon is sent down with the most rapid dispatch. If five sons of the same father be guilty of the same offence, one of them is forgiven, in order to continue the family, and comfort his aged parents in their decline.

Similar to this, there is a spirit of mercy breathes through the laws of England, which some errorseously endeavour to suppriess, the laws, however, seem unwilling to punish the offender or to furnish the officers of justice with every means of acting with seventy. Those who arrest debtors are denied the use of aims, the nightly watch is permitted to repress the disorders of the drunken citizens only with clubs, justice, in such a case, seems to hide her terrors, and permits some of fenders to escape rither than load any with a punishment drynopotatoned to the elime

Thus it is the glory of an Englishman, that he is not only governed by laws, but that these are also tempered by mercy, a country restrained by severe laws, and those, too, executed with severity (as in Japan), is under the most terrible species of tyranny, a royal tyrant is generally dreadful to the great, but numerous penal laws grand overy lank of people, and chiefly those least able to icsist oppression—the root of injustice. When a law enacted to make theft punishable with death happens to be equitably executed, it can at best only guard our possessions; but when, by favour or ignorance, justice pronounces a wrong verdict, it then attacks our lives, since, in such a case, the whole community suffers with the innocent victim if, therefore, in order to secure the effects of one man, I should make a law which should take away the life of another, in such a case, to attain a smaller good, I am guilty of a greater evil, to secure society in the possession of a hauble, I render a real and valuable possession precarious. And indeed the experience of every age may serve to vindicate the assertion. No law could be more just than that called lesse majestatis, when Rome was governed by Emperors it was but reasonable, that every conspiracy against the administration should be detected and punished . yet what ten able slaughters succeeded in consequence of its enactment, pro scriptions, stranglings, poisonings, in almost every family of distinction, yet all done in a legal wayevery cruminal had his trial, and lost his life by a majority of witnesses

And such will ever be the case, where punishments are numerous, and where a week, victions, but above all, where a meicenary magistrate is concorned in their execution such a man desires to see penal laws increased, since he too frequently has it in his power to turn them into instruments of extorious, in such hands, the more laws, the wider means, not of satisfying justice, but of satisfying avance

A meacenary magistrate, who is rewarded in proportion, not to his integrity, but to the number he convicts, must be a person of the most unblemished character, or he will lean on the side of cruelty, and when once the work of injustice is begun, it is impossible to tell how far it will proceed It is said of the hyana, that, naturally, it is no way ravenous, but when once it has tasted human flesh, it becomes the most voracious animal of the forest and continues to persecute mankind even after A corrupt magistrate may be considered as a human hymna he begins, perhaps, by a private snap, he goes on to a morsel among friends, he proceeds to a meal in public, from a meal he advances to a surfeit, and at last sucks blood like a vampire.

Not into such hands should the administration of justice be intrusted, but to those who know how to reward as well as to punish It was a fine saying of Nangfu the emperor, who, being told that his enemies had raised an insurjection in one of the distant provinces, "Come, then, my triends," said he, "follow me, and I promise you that we shall quickly destroy them" He marched forward, and the rebels submitted upon his approach All now thought that he would take the most signal icvenge, but were surprised to see the captives treated with mildness and humanity "How!" cue- his first minister, "is this the manner in which you fulfil your promise? your royal word was given that your enemies should be destroyed, and behold you have pardoned all, and even caressed some! "_" I promised," replied the emperor with a generous an, "to destroy my enemies, I have fulfilled my word, for see they are enemies no longer, I have made friends of them "

This, could it always succeed, were the time method of destroying the enemies of the state, woll it were, if rewards and mercy alone could regulate the commonwealth but since punishments are sometimes necessary, let them at least be rendered terrible, by being executed but seldom, and let Justice lift her sword rather to terrify than revenge.—Adieu.

XXX

TILL LADILS' TRAINS REDICULLE

I HAVE as yet given you but a short and imperfect description of the ladies of England Woman, my friend, is a subject not easily understood, even in China, what, therefore, can be expected from my knowledge of the sex, in a counting where they are universally allowed to be riddles, and I but a stranger?

To confess a truth, I was afraid to begin the description, lest the sex should undergo some new revolution before it was finished, and my picture should thus become old before it could well be said to have ever been new To-day they are lifted upon stilts, to morrow they lower their heels, and ruise their heads their clothes at one time are bloated out with whalebone, at present they have laid their hoops saids, and are become as slim as mermands. All, all is in a state of continual fluctuation, from the mandalin's wife who rattles through the street in her chariot, to the humble sempstress who clatters over the pavement in iron shod patters.

What chiefly distinguishes the sex at present is the train. As a lady's quality or fashion was once determined here by the excumference of her hoop, both are now measured by the length of her tail Women of moderate fortunes are contented with tails moderately long, but ladies of true taste and distinction set no bounds to then ambition in this particular I am told the lady mayoress, on days of ceremony, carries one longer than a bell wether of Bantam, whose tail, you know, is trundled along in a wheelbarrow

Sun of China, what contradictions do we find in this strange world! not only the people of different countries think in opposition to each other, but the inhabitants of a single island are often found inconsistent with themselves. Would you believe it? this very people, my Fum, who are so foud of seeing then women with long tails, at the same time dock their hoises to the very rump!

But you may easily guess, that I am no ways displeased with a fashion which tends to increase a demand for the commodities of the East, and is so very beneficial to the country in which I was born Nothing can be better calculated to increase the price of silk than the present manner of dressing A lady's train is not bought but at some expense. and after it has swept the public walks for a very few evenings, is fit to be worn no longer more with must be bought in order to repair the breach, and some ladies of peculiar economy are thus found to natch up then tails eight or ten times in a season This unnecessary consumption may introduce poverty here, but then we shall be the richer for it in China

The Man in Black, who is a professed enemy to this manner of ornamenting the tail, assures me there are numberless inconveniences attending it, and that a lady dressed up to the fashion is as much a cupple as any in Nankin But his chief indignation is levelled at those who diess in this manner, without a proper fortune to support it He assures me, that he has known some who would have a tul though they wanted a netticoat, and others, who, without any other pretensions, fancied they became ladies merely from the addition of three superfluous yuds of ragged silk "I know a thrifty good woman," continues he, "who, thinking herself obliged to carry a train like her betters, never walks from home without the uneasy apprehensions of wearing it out too soon: every excursion she makes gives her new anxiety, and her train is every bit as importunate, and wounds her peace as much, as the bladder we sometimes see tied to the tail of a cat."

Nay, he ventures to affirm, that a train may often bring a lady into the most critical errounstances "for should a rudo fellow," says he, "offer to conic up to avish a liss, and the lady attempt to avoid it, in retiring she must necessarily tread upon her taun, and thus fall fauly upon her lack; by which means, every one knows—her clothes may be should."

The Ludes here make no scruple to lough at the smallness of a Chinese slipper, but I fincy our wives in China would have a more real cause of lughter, could they but see the immoderate length of an European fram Head of Confucius! to view a human being crippling herself with a great unweldy tail for our diversion Backward she cannot go, forward she must move but slowly, and if ever she attempts to turn round, it must be in a circle not smaller than that described by the wheeling crocodile, when it would face an assailant And yet to think that all this confers importance and majesty! to think that a lady acquires additional respect from fifteen yards of trailing taffety! I cannot contain-ha! ha! ha! this is certainly a remnant of European barbarity the female Tartar, dressed in sheep skins, is in far more convenient drapery Their own writers have sometimes inveighed against the absurdaty of this fashion, but perhaps it has never been indiculed so well as upon the Italian theatre, where Pasquarielle, being engaged to attend on the Countess of Fernambroco, having one of his hands employed in carrying her muff, and the other her landog, he bears her train majestically along, by sticking it in the waistband of his biceches -Adien.

XXXI

MISFORTUNES OF POPTS

I FARCY the chuacter of a poet is in every country the same, fond of onjoying the present, careless of the future, his conversation that of a man of sense, his actions those of a fool, of fortitude able to stand unnoved at the bursting of an earthquake, yet of sensibility to be affected by the breaking of a teacup Such is his churicter, which, considered in every light is the very opposite of that which leads to riches

The poets of the West are as remarkable for their indigence as their genius, and yet, among the numerous hospitals designed to relieve the poor, I have heard of but one exceted for the benefit of decayed anthors. This was founded by Pope Ulban VIII, and called The Refrent of the internating, that it was equally impossible to recluin the patients who sued for reception from poverty maintaing, that it was equally impossible to reclaim the patients who sued for reception from poverty or from poetry. To be since, were I to send you an account of the lives of the Western poets, either uncent or modern, I fancy you would think me employed in collecting materials for a history of human wratchedness necent or modern, I fancy you would think me employed in collecting materials for a history of human wratchedness.

Homer is the first poet and boggar of note among the ancients he was blind, and sung his ballads about the streets, but it is observed, that his mouth was more frequently filled with verses than with bread Plautay, the come poet, was better off he had two trades, he was a poet for his diversion, bread Flatuas, the comic poet, was considered inhe had two trades, he was a poet for his diversion, and helped to turn a mill in order to gain a hvelihood Terence was a slave, and Boethus died in a guol

Among the Italians, Paulo Borghese, almost as good a poet as Tasso, knew formteen deficient

Among the Italians, Paulo Borghese, almost as good a poet as Tasso, knew fourteen different trades, and yet died because he could get employment in none. Tasso inmself, who had the most annable character of all poets, has often been obliged to borrow a cown from some friend, in order to pay for a month's subsistence he has left us a pretty somet, addressed to his cat, in which he begs the light of her eyes to write by, being too poor to afford himself a candle. But Bentavogito, poor Bentavoglio i chiefly demands our pity. His comedies will last with the Italian language he dissipated a noble fortung in a tas of charge and beconvolonce, but, felling into misery in his old age, was refused to be admitted into an hospital which be himself had erected

In Spain, it is said, the great Cervantes died of hunger, and it is certain that the famous Camoens ended his days in an hospital

It we turn to France, we shall there had even stronger instances of the ingratitude of the public Vaugelas, one of the politest writers and one of the honestest men of his time, was suinamed the Owl. from his being obliged to keep within all day, and venture out only by night, through fear of his creditors. His last will is very remarkable. After having bequeathed all his worldly substance to the discharging his debts, he goes on thus "But as there still may remain some creditors unpaid, even after all that I have shall be disposed of, in such a case it is my last will, that my body should be sold to the surgeons to the best advantage, and that the purchase should go to the discharging those debts which I owe to society, so that if I could not, while living, at least when dead I may be useful"

Cassandre was one of the greatest genuses of his time, yet all his merit could not procure him a bare subsistence. Being by degrees driven into a hatred of all mankind, from the little pity he found amongst them, he even ventured at last ungratefully to impute his calamities to Providence. In his last agonics, when the priest entreated him to rely on the justice of Heaven, and ask mercy from him that made him,—"If God," replies he, "has shown me no justice here what leason have I to expect any from him henefited?" But being answered, that a suspension of justice was no argument that should induce us to doubt of its reality—"Lot me entreat you," continued his confessor, "by all that is deur, to be reconciled to God, your father, your maker, and finend"—"No," replied the exaspenated wireth, "you know the manner in which he left me to live;

17771

163

stretched, "you see the manner in which he leaves me to die!"

But the sufferings of the poet in other countries is nothing when compared to his distresses here the names of Spenser and Otway, Butler and Dividenand," pointing to the straw on which he was names of Sponses and Otway, Butler and Dijdenaic every day mentioned as a national reproach some of them lived in a state of precarnous indigence and others literally died of hunger At present the few poets of England no longer depend on the great for subsistence, they have now no other pations but the public, and the public, collectively considered, is a good and a generous master It is, indeed, too frequently mistaken as to the merits of every candidate for favour, but to make amends, it is never mistaken long. A performance indeed, may be forced for a time into reputation, but, destitute of real ment, it soon sinks, time, the touchstone of what is truly valuable, will soon discover the fraud, and an author should never amogate to himself any share of success, till his works have been read at least ten years with satisfaction

A man of letters at present, whose works no valuable, is perfectly sensible of their value Every polite member of the community, by buying what he writes, contributes to reward him. The ridcule, therefore, of living in a guiret might have been with in the last age, but continues such no longer, because no longer true A writer of real

ment now may easily be nich, if his heart be set only on fortune, and for those who have no ment, it is but fit that such should remain in merited obscurity He may now refuse an invitation to dinner, without fearing to meur his patron's displeasine, or to starve by remaining at home. He may now venture to appear in company with just such clothes as other men generally wear, and talk even to princes with all the conscious superiority of wisdom Though he cannot boast of fortune here, yet he can bravely assert the dignity of independence - Adion

TYYY

THE MANNER IN WHICH SOME PHILOSOPHERS MAKE ARTIFICIAL MISLRY

THE mind is ever ingenious in making its own distress The wandering beggar, who has none to protect, or feed, or to shelter him, fancies complete happiness in labour and a full meal, take hum from rags and want, feed, clothe, and employ him, his wishes now use one step above his station, he could be happy were he possessed of nament, food, and ease Suppose his wishes gratified even in these, his prospects widen as he ascends he finds himself in affluence and tranquillity, indeed, but indolence soon breeds anxiety, and he desires not only to he freed from pun, but to be possessed of pleasure. pleasure is granted him, and this but opens his soul to ambition , and ambition will be sure to taint his future happiness, either with jerlousy, disappointment, or fatigue

But of all the arts of distress found out by man for his own toment, publips that of philosophic misery is most fully indicalous, a passion nowhere carried to so extravagant on excess as in the country where I now reside. It is not enough to engage all the compassion of a philosophic here, that his own globe is harassed with wars, postelence, o babarity, he shall grieve for the inhabitants of the moon, if the situation of her imaginary mountains happens to after, and dread the extraction of the sun, if the spots happen to increase. One should imagine, that philosophy was introduced to make men happy, but here it serves to make hundreds miserable.

My landlady, some days ago, brought me the diary of a philosopher of this desponding sort who had lodged in the apartment before me It contains the history of a life which seems to be one continued tissue of sorrow, apprehension, and distress A single week will serve as a specimen of the whole -"MONDAY --In what a trussient decaying situation are we placed, and what various leasons does philosophy furnish to make mankind unbappy! A. single giam of mustrid shall continue to produce its similitude through numberless successions, yet what has been granted to this little seed, has been denied to our planetary system the mustaid seed is still unaltered, but the system is growing old, and must quickly fall to decay How terrible will it he, when the motions of the planets have at last become so a regular as to need repairing, when the moon shall fall into frightful paroxysms of alteration , when the earth, deviating from its ancient track, and with every other planet forgetting its circular revolutions, shall become so eccentric, that unconfined by the laws of system, it shall fly off into boundless space, to knock against some distant world, or fall in upon the sun, either extinguishing his light, or burned up by his flames in a moment! Perhaps, while I write, thus dicadful change has begun. Shield me from universal run! Yet idiot man laughs, sings, and rejoices, in the very face of the sun, and seems no way touched with his situation.

"TUFSDAY -Went to bed in great distress, awaked and was comforted by considering that this change was to happen at some indefinite time, and therefore, like death, the thoughts of it might easily be borne But there is a revolution a fixed determined revolution, which must certainly come to pass, yet which, by good fortune, I shall never feel, except in my posterity The obliquity of the equator with the coliptic is now twenty minutes less than when it was observed two thousand years ago by Piteas If this be the case, in six thousand the obliquity will be still less by a whole degree This being sup posed, it is evident that our earth, as Louville has clearly proved, has a motion, by which the climates must necessarily change place, and in the space of one million of years England shall actually travel to the Antarctic pole I shudder at the change? How shall our unhappy grandchildren endure the hideous climate! A million of years will soon be accomplished, they are but a moment when compared to eternity , then shall our charming country, as I may ear, in a moment of time, resemble the hideous wilderness of Nov 2 Zembla

"Weunesday -To-night, by my calculation, the long predicted comet is to make its first appearance to be scorched in its fires, or only smothered in the vapour of its tail? That is the question! Thoughtless mortals, go build houses, plant orchards, purchase estates, for to-morrow you die But what if the comet should not come? That would be equally fatal Comets are servants which periodically return to supply the sun with fuel If our sun, therefore, should be disappointed of the expected supply, and all his fuel be in the meantime buint out, he must expire like an exhausted taper miserable situation must our earth be in without his enlivening rays! Have we not seen several neighbouring suns disappear? Has not a fixed star, near the tail of the Ram, lately been quite extinguished?

fuel, thirdly, sorry lest the wits should laugh at our enoneous predictions, and, fourthly, sorry because, if it appears to-night, it must necessarily come within the sphere of the earth's attraction, and Heaven help the unhappy country on which it happens to fall ! "FRIDAY -Our whole somety have been out, all eager in search of the comet We have seen not less than sixteen comets in different parts of the heavens However, we are unammously resolved to

"Thursday -The comet has not yet appeared, I am sorry for it first, sorry because my calculation is false, secondly, sorry lest the sun should want fix upon one only to be the comet expected That near Virgo wants nothing but a tail to fit it out completely for terrestrial admiration "SATURDAY -The moon is, I find, at her old

Her appulses, librations, and other irregularities, indeed amaze me My daughter, too, is this morning gone off with a grenadier No way surprising; I was never able to give her a relish for wisdom. She ever promised to be a mere expletive in the creation. But the moon, the moon gives me real uneasmess, I fondly fancied I had fixed her I had thought her constant, and constant only to me, but every night discovers her infidelity, and proves me a desolate and abandoned lover"-Adicu

mxxx

THE PROPER MUST BE CONTENTED TO BE JUDGED BY THOSE WHOM THEY HAVE APPOINTED TO GOVERN A STORY TO THIS EFFECT.

In every society some men are born to teach, and others to receive instruction, some to work, and others to enjoy in illeness the fruits of their industry, some to govern, and others to obey. Every people, how free soever, must be contented to give up part of their liberty and judgment to those who govern, in exchange for their hopes of security, and the motives which first influenced their choice in the election of their governors should ever be weighed against the succeeding apparent inconsistencies of their conduct All connot be inless, and men are generally best governed by a few. In making way through the intricacies of business, the smallest obstacles are apt to retaid the execution of what is to be planned by a multiplierty of counsels, the judgment of one alone being always fittest for wind-

GOLDSMITH'S ESSAYS ing through the labyrinths of intrigue, and the obstructions of disappointment A screent which, as the fable observes, is furnished with one head and many tails, is much more capable of subsistence and expedition than another which is furnished with but one tail and many heads Obvious as these tiuths are, the people of this country seem insensible of their force. Not satisfied with the advantages of internal peace and opulence, they still mumus at then governors, and interfere in the execution of their designs, as if they wanted to be something more than happy. But as the Europeans instruct by argument, and the Aunties mostly by narration, were I to address them, I should convey my sentiments in the following stor v — "Takupi had long been prime minister of Tipai-

170

[77710]

tala, a fertile country that stretches along the western confines of China During his administration whatever advantages could be derived from uts, learning and commerce, were seen to bless the people, nor were the necessary precautions of providing for the security of the state forgotten It often happens, however, that when men are possessed of all they want, they begin to find torment from imaginary afflictions, and lessen then present enjoyments, by foreboding that those en loyments are to have an end The people now, therefore, endeavoured to find out girevances, and, after some search, actually began to think themselves aggreeved A petition against the enormities of Takupi was carried to the thione in due form, and the Queen who governed the country, willing to satisfy her subjects, appointed a day in which his accuse s should be heard, and the minister should stand upon his defence.

"The day being arrived, and the minister brought before the tribunal, a carrier, who supplied the city with fish, appeared among the number of his accusors. He exclaimed, that it was the custom, time immemorial, for carriers to bring their fish upon a hoise in a hamper; which, being placed on one side, and balanced by a stone on the other, was thus conveyed with ease and safety, but that the pisonen, moved either by a spirit of innovation, or perhaps bribed by the hamper makers, had obliged all carriers to use the stone no longer, but balance one hamper with another, an order entirely repugnant to the customs of all antiquity, and those of the kingdom of Tipartala in particular.

"The carrier finished, and the whole court shook their heads at the innovating minister, when a second witness appeared He was inspector of the city buildings, and accused the disgraced favounte of having given orders for the demolition of an anceint run, which obstructed the passage through one of the principal streets. He observed, that such buildings were noble monuments of barbarons antiquity, contributed finely to show how little their ancestors understood of architecture, and for that reason such monuments should be held sacred, and suffered gradually to decay

"The last witness now appeared This was a widow, who had laulably attempted to burn leaseft upon her husband's funeral pile But the innovating minister had prevented the execution of her design, and was insensible to her tears, protestations, and entreaties favour"

[XXXII]

172

"The Queen could have pardoned the two former offences, but this last was considered as so gross an muny to her sex, and so directly contrary to all the customs of antiquity, that it called for immediate 'What ' cired the Queen, 'not suffer a woman to burn herself when she thinks proper? The sex me to be prettily tutored, no doubt, if they must be restrained from entertaining their female friends now and then with a fried wife, or roasted acquaintance I sentence the criminal to be banished my presence for ever, for his injurious treatment of

"Takupi had been hitherto silent, and spoke only to show the sincerity of his resignation 'Great Queen,' cried he, 'I acknowledge my crime, and since I am to be bamshed, I beg it may be to some runed town, or desolate village, in the country I have governed I shall find some pleasure in im-proving the soil, and bringing back a spirit of industry among the inhabitants' His request appearing reasonable, it was immediately complied with, and a courtier had orders to fix upon a place of banishment answering the minister's description After some months' search, however, the inquiry proved fruitless, neither a desolate village nor a rumed town was found in the whole kingdom "Alas," said Takupi then to the Queen, 'how can that country be ill-governed which has neither a desolate village not a numed town in it?' The Queen perceived the justice of his expostulation, and the minister was received into more than former

XXXIV.

THE UTILITY AND ENTERTAINUPNE THAT MIGHT RESULT

I MAY frequently been amazed at the ignorance of almost all the European travellers who have penefixed any considerable way enskward into Astra. They have been influenced either by motives of commence or pietry, and then accounts are such as might resonably be expected from men of resynarrow or very prejudiced education—the dictates of superattion, or the result of ignorance. In not surplicit, that in such a variety of alreations on the surplies and in the surplies of demelli, the learned are long agreed that the whole is but an imposfure

There is scarcely any country, how rude or uncultivated soever, where the inhabitants are not postessed of some recular secrets, either in nature or art, which might be transplanted with success In Siberian Tartary, for instance, the natives extract a strong sparst from milk, which is a secret probably unknown to the chemists of Larone the most savage part of India they are possessed of the secret of dwerner veretable substances scarlet. and of refining levi into a metal which, for hardness and colour, is little interior to silver not one of which scriets but would, in Europe, make a man's fortune The power of the Asiatics in moducing wands, or bainging down tam, the Europeans are upt to treat as fabulous, because they have no instances of the like nature unong themselves, but they would have treated the screets of gunpowder and the muturer's compass in the same manner, had they been told the Chinese used such aits before the invention was common with themselves at home

Of all the English philosophers I most revolence Broom, that grots and hardy genus. He its who allows of secrets yet unknown, who, undaunted by the seeming difficulties that oppose, prompts human curiousty to examine every part of nature, and even exhorts man to try whether he cannot subject the tempost, the thunder, and even enthquakes, to human control! Oh, did a man of his daring spirit, of his genus, penetration, and learning, travel to those countries which have been visited only by the superstitions and the mercenerry, what might not mankind expect! How would he enlighten the regions to which he travelled! and what a variety of knowledge and useful improvement would he not bring bock in exchange

There is, probably, no country so barbarous, that would not disclose all it three, if it received from the traveller equivilent information and I am apt to think, that a person who was ready to give more knowledge than he received would be welcome wherever he cume All his care in travelling should only be to suit his intellectual banquet to the people with whom he conversed, he should not attempt to teach the unlettered Taitar astronomy, nor yet instruct the polite Clinese in the rader atts of subsistence. He should endeavour to improve the barbarian in the secrets of hying comfort by, and the inhabition of a more refined country in the speculative pleasures of seiches. How much more nobly would a philosopher thus employed spens has time, than by sitting at home, earnestly intent upon adding one star more to his catalogue, or one monster more to his collection, or still, if possible, more triflingly sedulous in the incatenation of fleas, or the sculpture of a cherry-stone!

I never consider this subject without being surpused, that none of those societies so laudably established in England for the promotion of arts and learning have ever thought of sending one of their members into the most eastern parts of Asia, to make what discoveries he was able. To be convinced of the utility of such an undertaking, let them but read the relations of their own travellers It will there be found, that they are as often deceived themselves, as they attempt to deceive others The merchant tells us, perhaps, the price of different commodities, the methods of baling them up, and the properest manner for a European to preserve his health in the country. The missionary, on the other hand, informs us, with what pleasure the country to which he was sent embraced Christianity, and the numbers he converted, what methods he took to keep Lent in a region where there was no fish, or the shifts he made to celebrate the rites of his religion in places where there was neither bread nor wine! Such accounts, with the usual appendage of mairinges and funerals, inscriptions, rivers, and mountains, make up the whole of a European traveller's duary but as to all the secrets of which the inhabitants are possessed, those are universally attributed to magic, and when the traveller can give no other account of the wonders he sees performed, very contentedly ascribes them to the power of the devil chemist, "That if every aitist would but discover what new observations occurred to him in the exercise of his trade, philosophy would thence gain innumerable improvements" It may be observed, with stall greater justice, that if the useful knowledge of every country, however barbarous, was gleaned by a judicious observer, the advantages would be mestimable. Are there not even in Europe many useful inventions known or practised but in one place? The instrument, as an example, for cutting down coin in Germany is much more handy and expeditious, in my opinion, than the sickle used in England. The cheap and expeditious manner of making vinegal, without previous fermentition, 15 known only in a part of France If such discoveries, therefore, remain still to be known at home, what by ignorant travellers in hasty caravans? The caution with which foreigners are received in Asia may be alleged as an objection to such a design But how readily have several European merchants found admission into regions the most suspecting, under the character of Sanjapins, or northern pilgrims To such not even China itself denies access lovers of men The only difficulty would remain

176

funds of knowledge might not be collected in countries yet unexplored, or only passed through

To send out a traveller properly qualified for these purposes might be an object of national concern, it would in some measure repair the breaches made by ambition, and might show that there were still some who boasted a greater name than that of patacots, who professed themselves in choosing a proper person for so viduous an enterprise He should be a man of philosophical tium, one apt to deduce consequences of general utility from particular occurrences, neither swollen with pride, nor hardened by prejudice, neither wedded to one particular system, nor instructed only in one particular science; neither wholly a botanist, nor quite an antiquarian, his mind should be fractured with mi-cellineous knowledge, and his manner humanized by an intercourse with men, He should be in some measure an enthusiast in the design, fond of trivelling, from a rapid imagination and an unate love of change, furnished with a body expible of sustaining every fatigue, and a heart not easily torrified at danger -Adicu

XXXX.

A CONTESTED ELECTION

The English are at present employed in celebrating a feast, which becomes general every seventh year, the parliament of the nation being then dissolved, and another appointed to be chosen This solemnty fulls infinitely short of our Feist of the Lantons in magnificence and oplendour, it is also surpassed by others of the East in unanimity and pure devotion, but no festival in the world can compare with it for erting Their exting, indeed, amazes me, had I five hundred heads, and were each head furnished with brane, yet would they all be insufficient to compute the number of cows, pigs, geese, and turkeys, which, upon this occasion, die for the good of their country

179

To say the truth, eating come to make a grand ingredient in all Rugheli parties of real, business, or amusement. When a church is to be built, or an hospital endowed, the directors assemble, and instead of consulting upon it, they ext upon it, by which means the business poes forward with success When the poor are to be related, the others appointed to dole out public charity assemble and ext upon it. Not less it ever been known that they filled the belies of the poor, till they had previously satisfied then own But in the election of magis trates the people seem to exceed all bounds the ments of a candidate are often measured by the number of his treats, his constituents assemble, eat upon him, and lend then applause, not to his integrity or souse, but to the quantities of his beef and hundy. And yet I could for give this people their plentiful merk on this occasion, as it is extremely natural for every man to est a great deal when he gets it for nothing, but what amales me is, that all this good hving no way contributes to improve their good humour. On the contrary, they seem to love than temper as they lose their appetites, every morsel they swallow, and every glass they pour down, serves to mercase their ammosity Many an honest man, before as harmless as a tame rabbit, when lorded with a single election dinner, his become more dangerous than a charged culvering Upon one of these occasions I have retually seen a bloody minded man-milling, saily forth at the head of a mob, determined to face a desperate pistrycook. who was general of the opposite party But you must not suppose they are without a pretext for thus beating each other On the contrary, no man here is so uncivilized as to beat his neighbour without producing very sufficient reasons. One candidate, for instance, treats with gin, a spirit of their own manufacture, another always drinks brandy, imported from abread Brandy is a wholesome liquor, gin, a liquor wholly their own This, then, furnishes an obvious cause of quarrel,—Whether it be most reasonable to get diunk with gin, or get drunk with brandy! The mob meet upon the debate, fight themselves sober, and then draw off to get drunk again, and change for anothen chaounter. So that the English may now propelly be said to be engaged in war; since, while they are subdung their enemies abroad, they are breaking each office, sheads at home.

I lately made an excusion to a neighbouring village, in order to be a spectator of the ceremonies practised upon this occasion. I loft town in company with three fiddlers, nine dozen of hains, and a corporation peet, which were designed as reinfuccements to the gui-drinking party. We entered the town with a very good face, the fiddlers, no way mainfailed by the enemy, kept handling their arms up the principal street. By this prudent manecurve, they took peaceable possession of their head-quarters, amidst the shouts of multitudes, who seemed perfectly rejoiced at hearing their music, but above all at seeing their bacon.

I must own, I could not a load being pleased to see all ranks of people, on this occasion, levelled into an equality, and the poor, in some measure, enjoying the pinniare pirileges of nature. If there was any distinction shown, the lowest of the people seemed to receive it from the rich. I could perceive a cobbler with a levee at his door and a biberdasher giving audience from behind his counter

But my reflections were soon interinited by a mob, who demanded whether I was for the distillery or the brewery I as these were terms with which I has totally unacquainted, I chose at first to be silent; however, I know not what might not have been the consequence of my reserve, had not the mobbeen called off to a skirmish between a brundydinker's cow and a gm dimben's mastiff, which turned out, greatly to the satisfaction of the mob, in favour of the mastiff

This speciacle, which afforded high entertainment, was at last ended by the appearance of one of the annotation, who came to harangue the nob. he made a very pathetic speech upon the late excersive importation of foreign diams, and the downfull of the distillery, I could see some of the indicators shed teers. He was accompanied in his procession by Mrs. Deputy and Mrs. Mayoress. Mrs. Deputy was not in the least in liquor, and as for Mis. Mayoress, one of the spectators as uned me in my ear, that—she was a very fine woman before she had the smallpox.

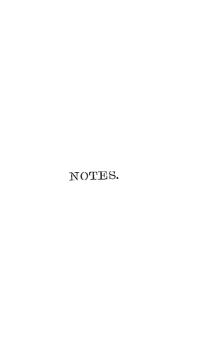

Mixing with the crowd, I was now conducted to Mixing with the crowd. I was now conducted to the hall where the magnetizates are chosen but what tongue can describe this reene of confusion I the whole crowd seemed equally mismed with anger, perhodic politics, principum, and punch I remarked one figure that was carried up by two men upon this occasion. I at first begin to put, his mifriculties as natural, but soon found the fellow so drunk that he could not stond, nother made his upon to make no other answer but "Tobacco and brandy" In short, an election hall seems to be a theatre, where every passion is seen without disguise : a school where fools may readily become worse, and where philosophers may gather wisdom - Adion.

stand, he actually lost the use of his tongue, and remained silent, a third, who, excessively drunk, could both stand and speak, being asked the candidate's name for whom he voted, could be prevailed

ESSAY L

P. 1. Such complaints as this casay commences with have been common in all ages. Herace lamented that

"Virtutem incolumem odimus, Sublatam ex oculis quærimus invida "

We hate virtue while alive; we esteem and regret it when it is taken from us

P 3. The Temple of Fame forms the subject of a most pleasing adaptation from Chancer by Pope, and, as he tells up in his meiatory advertisement that "the Poem is introduced in the manner of the Provencil poets, whose works were for the most part visions or pares of imagination, and constantly descriptive," it may be thought that Goldsmith borrowed from it his idea of calling this essiv a icyclic

Addrson was the author of a very considerable portion of the 'Spectator,' and of those numbers which me usually considered the most crecilient It would be superfluous here to speak more at length of him, or of Swift, Pope, Steele, or Congresse But, as Pope has often been reproached, and by some recent writers with great bitterness, for his attack on Addison in the epistle to Dr Arbuthnot, it may not be out of place to nount out that in the some imitations of Horace, now commonly known as the Satues and Tpistles, to which the coustle to Arbuthnot serves as the prologue, he speaks of Addison with the highest prass -

"And in our own [days] (excuse some courtly strums) No whiter page then Addison's remains '-11 1 216

Not should be omit to mention that Swift, to whom the

'Duncard' is ascribed, as the object of Pope's constant praise. for wit, yer wility, and patriotic independence "O thou! whatever title plans there en,

D us, Drapper, Paler tall, or Gullier, Whether thou choose Cors into s' serion ar-Or lough and shift in Bale last cast chair

Or pring the Court of marufa wanking. Or the grand country's copy or al one unland "

Du wwd. 1 19

And again -

186

"Let Ireland tell how wit upheld het cause, Het trude supported, and supplied her laws, And leave on Swift this gratful verse engrav'd, 'The Right's a Court attach'd, a portrait sav'd'; Sature and Engelse, II 1 224

P 3 Colley Chiber, who died in 1757, was the Poet Lauvade, and it was perhens on mg to Pope's gallonsy of him by reason of his holding this uppointment, for which Pope was disqualified by his ritizion (being a Roman Catholic), that the poet pluced him on the throne of the Dimess —

"High on a gorgoous seet that far outshone Honley's gilt tub, or Fie kno's Irish throne, Or that where on her Curlls the public pours All bounteous, frogrant grains, and golden showers, Gie & Chleyr sate"

But the spect or satter was untilly undescreed, (for Clibbr, though not distriguished as a peet, was the author of the 'Careless Husband,' and of most film one other comedy of far more than average merit, and cutanly descreed the "bluck eye" yalich the concluman here represent Clibber as hving given the saturst

P 4 This "consisted figure" with his prochet of the 'In spector' is meant fo. Sir John Hill, a physician, who wrote on the time of the proches of the physician
a great Variety of subjects, and, according to an epigram on him by Garrick,

"For physic and farces his equal there scarce is, This farces are physic, his physic a farce is "

He must have treel his hund at the drama, though the great actor and manager a description of them may explain or evenue our ignorance of even the titles of his drams. The description of him as "carrying a nessgay" is in allerion to an essay which he had published "on the method of rising double flowers from single ones"

If The producer of "some farces, a tragedy," & , s Mr. Athur Murphy, a very insteallancous wither. His one tragedy was the 'Oi phan of Chim'. But he also wrote several comedites, some of which, such as 'All in the Winer,' and 'The Way to Kuep Him' certainly deserve a higher title than that of Futers, 'though its best works of that kind were written after the publication of this ersay, for, though he was at that time upwards of thrifty sexts of gas, he had all the commonwhear works he published a translation of Tactins, which has considerable made.

P 4 The gentleman currying the 'Dictionary' and the 'Runblei 'is, of course, Dr Johnson, with whom the author (as his been mentioned in the Introduction) was soon to form a very intunate friendship.

P 5 The bearer of the essays, "thussedies against the religion of his country," but also of a 'hiday,' is Hume, the evcelonce of whose history presents a singular contast to the mischievous though feeble sophistires of his sceptured incipalities. He had just published his thard volume, which in his autobiography he mentions as having been received with in his autobiography he mentions as having been received with being particularly obnoxious"; but, though the preculing being particularly obnoxious"; but, though the preculing being particularly obnoxious"; but, though the preculing the his been religible that come to be acknowledged as that of the entire work has low been.

Ib The bearer of the "volummons Instay" and of the "romance" is Smellet, whose "History of Begland from the Revolution" was a work to which his talents were evidently mustical, but whose novels, 'Peregram Peclke,' "Humphrey Clinker" (not, however, published till 1771), and others, wer long ranked among the masterpaees of English faction, and would still be so, were they not disfigured with a consense and melcheary of which the present age is, impuly, less tolerant

than its predecessors

ESSAY II

The Bergea here mentioned as the son of Pope Alexander VI is C ear Berger, Due de Valentinous, a man whose character Brantome rather emionsly describes by saying he do! some good and some brant (ato that of dit soil), the harm beginning with the mander of his clide brother, to the grad money once (Indictra), of his fither i, and to whom Pope, with greater truth, alludes as the very personalization and embodiment of all wickedness.

"If plagues and carthqual as break not Heaven's design, Why then a Borga, or a Cattline?"

Eway on Man, 1 156.

The D and family "Amone, perhaps about, the peer and pances of the city, I destinguish the intal houses of Colomia and Oram, whose private story is an executial part of the annula of modern Rome" (Guibon, ed. vs.). And he proceeds to relate that the two houses were "on struct and equal antigoniests in the long hereighters feat which districted above 250° years the colors active "Two Popess" (Lectin III and Xin laber III exclusive the colors of the colors and the cases of the Church," exposed the cases of the Guille, and how "the leays on their brane"

If the character of the "tate Duke Mariborough" over wow "set up above that of his more talked of prodecesson," the outher must have expected pertents to become bland indeed in the year 1758 he was set up. Mr. Pita is Communderal Chief of the expedition against $\fomega$ Wallo, which he found to character than 20,000 men under his command. Lord Stan long, describes hune as "a man leyend all question love, Stanley, describes hune as "a man leyend all question love, Stanley, describes hune as "a man leyend all question love, Souloutund, and generous, but of no shunning talents in the field or "Lew there" ("History of Langland," chip XXVI).

P 5 Confucius was the great Chinese philosopher and I'm giver, who is said to have lived in the sixth century before the commoncement of the Christian or

Desar III

The expression of Talitus, to which reference is here made, is to be found in chap want of the 3rd book of the 'Anuals, m which the historian is disculsing the condition of the lumper under the culiet emperors "Corruptissions to publica plurime legis" (laus are most numerous in the most compt states), a centence in which it is worth remarking that Tuestus preserves the name of "republic," though his discontent is chiefly excited by the fact that the republic had long been trampled under foot. Montesquien was a President of the I touch I'ulerment in the latter half of the reign of Louis XV , who a rote an elaborate treatise on 'The Spirit of Laws ('L'I' prit des Loss'), of whom and of which Lord Macault) ens -" Monte-quien enjoys, perhaps, a uider celebrity than any political writer of modern Lanope Something he doubtless owes to his marit but much more to his fortune "He had the good luck of a Valenture. He caught the eye of the Prench nation at the moment when it was a along from the long sleep of political and religious birotra, and in consequence la become a fivourite. The Puglish, at that time, considered a Frenchman who talked about constitutional checks and funds mental law as a product not le s astomshing than the learned pag or the numberal infant. Specions but shellow, studions of effect, undifferent to truth, eager to build up a system, but curles of collecting the construct, out of a high alone count and durable syet in can be built, the hack I'm wheat constructed theory as require and slightly as card house, no somer proje ted than complited, no soon r completed then blown away, no somer blown as a, then forgotten" ( Critical and Historical J us, 1 100)

In the quotation from Sallast Goldenith occurs to regard some feature is concluding different from I reflect Libit Houses under the two assumpts my violence by their combined authority Massell x moule une adopting page 101 117 6 22

Essay IV

The phrise of "the Augustan age," used in reference to any modern nation, is evidently meant to express that age in which the most admirable writers of that nation flom shed, -writers as far superior to their predecessors of their successors as the Latin writers of the eighth century of Rome were speaking, neither Cicero, Taeitus, nor Pluny belong to the Augustan age, Ciccro being put to death several years before Augustus made himself supreme, and neither Tacitus nor Pliny being boin when he died But, in the first place, such a phrase mry be objected to, as assuming that there is generally such an age in the literature of every people-a doctrine which may well be doubted In the other classic country, Grecce, there was no such age There was, indeed, a period during which all the great writers and orators of Athens flourished, but not only did that period extend over one hundred and fifty years, from the time of Æschylus to that of Demosthenes, but the very greatest of the Greek poets, who were not dramatic, flourished centuries before the commencement of that era, and one, unrivalled to this day in his own line of pistoral or bucohe Poetry (Theocritus), a couple of generations later Again, if We examine the literary history of that median nation which, next to our own, has produced the most excellent writers Italy, we shall find that Dante, Bograccio, and Petrarch, are divided by many generations from Macmavelli, Amosto, Tasso, and Guicciardini Indeed if such a phrase could be applied to a dead language, at might still be furly contended that it was inapplicable to a lixing one. But there is a still greater objection to our author's stamping the age of Queen Anne with such lugh pruse, even though he somewhat e tends it by the rather vague addition of " some your before that period," an expression upp nently intended to include the later works of Dr.den-(those published after the death of Charles II ,) and though, at the other end, it is commonly extended to the death of Pope in the middle of the reign of George II For, if we compare it with the age of Elizabeth, we find in the latter Spensor, Shikspere, Breen, Hool et, Raleigh, Ben Jonson, Massinger, Beanmont and Fictcher, and Milton as to his entire noiks And it me compare it with the age of the Restoration we find in that Milton in his maturer genius and grander works Couley, Willer, Butler, Othay, Dryden (at all events the mayority of his worls), Chrendon, Burnet (whose great history of the Reformation was published in 1679), Lock of Shaftesbury, and Halitax, with the get divines Richop Tivlor and Dr. Isaac Burnet. Now in each of their periods we find outhors of the very brighte t general with when certain one writer of Queen Anna s time (an

be compreted for a moment. And thus, indeed, scens to he admitted by our enthor himself in this very essen, vince, while extelling the minor of "strength and grace," of "state red genuis," which he finds in the writer of Anne's time, he con fesses, that "no one writer attents our attention singly", but the horour which he cleams for them is due to thus a secondary, "like state bot in each other's prejimines, they have cust a history upon the age in which they have?"

We must contrad that such is not the true test by which such a question should be desired, but that whit the errice should regard as the power and brilliancy of the brightest not the amount of light custing in the miss, and thit, viewed thus, Shakspier or hillion originises the whole company, of which Pope is the chair, just as, to follow out our author's smite, years of Jupites in migh severe is a most conspicuous and attractive object than the whole milky way administration of the first proper shifty say.

And we must contend farther that, even it is the consideration to be underlying to authors of merit is the consideration to be underlying to the same that the consideration is the content of the same that of the same that the same tha

P 19 Str Reger L'Estrange's writings were almost confined to pointed pamphlets. He," more insert compositions? to which the text dilindes, were chiefly trunslations of classical works, such as Cheevi's 'Offices,' and Range's fables. Spence, in lies ancedobes, mentions this Pope rated his style very highly and on one occasion blaced him on a level with Ben lorson and

Congrete for east and elegance in familiar dialogue

If Dryden it is superfluence to dwell on Dryden's poetry, and when our author says that "had it not been for him we never should have known a Pope," he is only repeating what is family confessed by Pope himself, but in what he says of the case and eigenvee of his proce he authoristy the prince which losson gave him some years later in his "Lates of the Poets"

P 20 Olvay was a tagge writer of the reign of Chailes II, whose most celebrated plays are 'Venice Preserved' and 'The Ornhun' In his 'Essiy on the Drama' Walter Scott fully endorses the culogy here bestowed on him, adding that in pathos he is superior to Shakspere himself. But the great Genmay crite A. W. Schlegel, while sometime is mastery of the pathetic, changes him with great "ignorance of the true rules of composition," supporting his censure by the statement that "he has taken half of the scenes of his 'Canus Manus' verhally, or with disfiguring changes, from the 'Romeo and Juliut' of Shakspeir. P. 20. Eco. was a contemporary of Otway, whom he surrared of his youthful muss," but his work have fallen into oblivion

The Rowe was Poet Luneate in the regul of Anne and the

In More was Poet Laurents in the regul of Anne and the first years of George I Among other plays he wrote 'Jane Shore' and 'The Fair Pentient' (the name of a principal character in which, Lothauto, has become proverbial as a synonym for a labe) From one of Walpole's letters (Nov 12, 1740) we learn that he had the singular compliment paid him of having his 'Tamerlane' always acted on King William's birthday But Johnson regulas his translation of Lucan's 'Phaisilm' as his best title to fame, affirming that there is peilups no trunslation that so completely exhibits the genus and spirit of the outgoil

P 21 Sir Richard Fonshows was a diplomatist of such reputation that he was employed in the negotiation of the marriage of Chailes II with the Infonta of Portugal. Catharine of Braganza, and was employed in more than one other subsequent mission of importance

The Lorae Arkington was one of the Cabul Munistry, he is the minister of whom Scott makes the Duke of Buckungiam say that had he held like sourt as King of the Isle of Mun he would have taught Jermingham (his valet). "In half a day to look as wise, walk as softly, and speak as stilliv as Hurry Bennet." ("Persent of the Perk," c 26) But Massablay in his case on the W. Temple, speaks of him as one whose "mirth made his presence always welcome in the toyal closet," supporting his description by a quotation from Chiendon, who records that "his pleasant and agree able humour made him acceptable to the Ling.", nd from Evelyn, who had "conversed much with hun, and prenounced him to be a mun of singulatly polished maunos, and of geret colloqual powers."

Ib Str W Tempte was the Entish Munster at the Hagne in the early put of the search of Charles 11, and gained a high seputation as the projector and chief negotiator of the Tuple Alliance, concluded in 1668 hetween Great Britain, Holland, and Sweden, by which Loux XIV was compelled to agree to a perce. In Johnson gives him the credit of having been the "first write who gave cadence to English piots".

Ib I ocke, who was born in 1632, and died in 1704, is but known in the present day as the author of the 'Essays on the Human Understanding' But he wrote other treatises also of great excluence on Civil Government, on Education, and on the Hensonaldence of Christiantty, &c. &c. Whin Lord Shaftebury was mide Lord Gham Glor, he, having cone rived a high opinion of Locke's ablutes, gave him a valuable reponding in his office, but the councion with him subsignmently proved a source of danger to Locke, who fide to Holland, and ranamed there till the Restortion, when he accompanied the Princess of Orange Dock to Fighand Abriham Coyley is described by Johnson as the cluef of the "includy-used ports," who spoid their works by centratured oncests, and constant attempts at art, in suson and out of sevens, but the wane entropics his proce, a rolume of every very high price as having "an cast and smooth equalities, in which nothing is fin singlet or hard televored, but all its permission of the contraction of the contraction of the contraction of the substantial contraction.

without feebkness, and familiar without grossness "

P 21 Tillotten' raceaure of sorting. This great provider via made Primate, greatly aguined his social will, by William III when Saucroft was dequived on his refusel to take the oth of allign unce to the new Sourcege, Macunity attributes to him a great share in persuading the Primers Anne to consent to the one arringements. Goldwarth's opinion of his style closely agrees with that of Drydan, who, as Congree priorit, "the pacific was all the same that if he had any then the Lagislas press, it was eventy to his having often read the Drydan's delay.

Dr Isaac Barrose was almost equally emment as a classical scholar, a mathematician, and a divine. He was Grook Professor, and Lucasian Professor of Mathematics at Cambridge, and afterwirds Master of Trinity College. He died in 1677, at the early age of 48

the early age of 18

Atterbury, Brehop of Rochester, of his intimacy with whom Pone may as frequent beasts. In the lines—

"How pleasing Atterbury's softer hour,

How shin'd the soul unconquer'd in the Tower "

Epilogue to the Satures, 82

he refers to he are at and subsequent beauthment for complicity in plots for the asstoration of the Pretender

P 22 Shaftesbury The third carl, the author of several works generally condemned for their destrical tendency

P 25 Bolumprole Henry St John, Loud Roinglands, west he Scensiary of Stule who, in Anne's regn, negotiated the peuce of Utredit, and was afterwards unproched for tre-anable plots to pettore the Pretender. He field, but was sub-sequently permutted to return to England when Str R Walpol was Primo Munster. His reputation as an entry was unsurpused in his day, but that of a writer soon passed away. In one of his pumphlets Burle says," Who reads Bolingbroke now?

P. 21 Ledge, be asked writing several political pumphlets (one intitled 'An Aniwat to the king') ognist William's Government, engaged in theological controversy with almost every sect of Nonconformats. Macualay gives Jum the credit of brung been "of all the nonjuning clerg, the best qualified to discuss constitutional questions"—Into of Lyna, in 150.

P 25 Redpath and Dunton are mentioned in the 'Dunered by Pope, who speaks of "Dunton's modern bed," and, two lines

afterwards, couples Redpath with Defoe and others

"Eraless on high stood unabash'd Defoe, And Tutchin frag int from the scourge below; There Redpath, Roper endzell'd you might view." Discussed, it 149

Addrson and Steele have been spoken of in the Introduction And Dr Arbuthnot was the friend to whom Pope inscribed his 'Imitations of Horace,' now commonly known as his 'Satires and Emstles' He was the author of what is perhaps the best political sature in the language, "Some Passages in the Lafe of John Bull," a name which the nation has ever since, with entire complicency, appropriated to itself. By some singular confusion it is usually published among the works of his triend Dean Swift, the still more celebrated author of 'The Tale of a Tub, ' Gullace's Travels,' and the 'Dramer's Letters ' I do not know whether in the whole of these essays anything is more remarkable than Goldsmith's complaint of Swift's deliciency in manimess and clearness of diction in political writing; though when the complaint is impartially examined, many will probably agree that it is not altogether void of foundation, but that Swift's postponement of all graces of style to the desire to be cuergetic and terse, too often makes his meaning somewhat obscure This defect is, however, less visible in the 'Diapier's Letters' than in his other political pamphilets, such as that on the 'Conduct of the Allies'

10 D. For Goldsmith has speaks of the great author of Robinson Crasse' solely as a politural pumplictor, an occupation which, in the changing times in which he lived, brought in alternately preference and suffering I. King Whilsin's time he was new raid with a place. Under Anne he was put in the pillor, as Pope spiratelly records in the presser aiready quoted from the 'Durenad' in the present century Welter Soott has made him the subject of entitiessite pursue, as indeed he especially deserved at his hands, since Deloc was his own precusion in that speaks of fiction to which he lumiself owes perhaps his greatest popularity—the Insterical movel. His Wilkings of a Cavaliat' may be regarded as the prototype of

0 2

194

Scott's admirably humorous 'Legend of Montrose', and his 'Manous of Orptian Cublaton' is not only to this day the best account in the language of the exploits of the famous Lord Peterbonously, but has the augular distinction of having deceived the critical vontiness of Dr Johnson, who took it lot a gramma authorizants.

ESSAY VY

This eyay was published in the first year of the required following to whose recent accession it alludes. And the political segmenty with which it miss upon the advantage of a Pathamentary Opposition, provided its regulant criticism of the measures of the earling Administration does not degenerate into fictions party spurit, is the more remarkable because just at that time the successes of All Pitt's wrible whence, so flattening to our intuned party, but so united all patters that to quote the language of House Walpole, "the numbers would so more hear 'No' from a county member than a suiter from an old mad."

Essiz AIII

P 43 "In the first ages of manlina the unlittered nind must have been street such subtraction conceptions," &c It is a singular considence of ideas, it ilss sentence did not suggest to Words worth one of the most pocheal pussages in the 'Excursion'.

"The lively Greenin, in a land of hills, Rivers, and fertile plains, and sounding choics, Under a cope of sky more variable, Could find commodious place for every God.

Could find commodious place for every Go

A gay or pensive tendences, prevailed Where piety more awful had relayed 'Take, running river, take these looks of mine,' Thus would the votary say, 'this sever'd hau, My vow fulfilling, do I here present,' " & a.

in every grove

P 45 The Salum priests They were priests of Mar-Vigal describes them —

"Tum Salu ad cantus, meensa altana cheum, Populeis adsunt evincti tempora ramis" — An vin 285

Translated by Dryden -

"The Salu sing, and cense his alters round With Saban smoke, their heads with poplar bound "

195

P 45 "The Ordinan song," be: The best explanation of the title Other given to Diama (at Spin ta chirth) seems to be because her statue stood creek (open, upright). It is not very clear where Goldsmith got the idea of any Greek people habitually sectificing their chirliben to Diams, on the continuty, she roften described by cythets (maderpaper, koupérpaper) which tather represent he, as the noutsher or undestress of children, though it is true that in the story of "Iphiquema" site (not a Alad, but a goom up vigin) was to be sentified to Diams.

The Samoteds are the tribe inhabiting the province of Northern Russia, which her to the east of the White Sea P 46 Milton alludes to the human sacrifices to Moloch —

"First Moloch, hourd king, beymen'd with blood Of human securice and parents' tears"

Par. Lost, 1 392

P 41 "It is neal known that Plada expited Hower from his Commonwearth," &c Goldsmith is alliading to the following passages in the 'Republic' of the great philosopher — We must not keen to Homer or any other poet who is guilty of the folly of saying that at the thrishold of Zons he two casks full of lots, one of good, the other of evil " (17', 24, 257, And again, "Zens is the dispensed of good and will to ve" '11', 2, 69' 'Repub' in 37' Jonett's translation—and in a subsequent pressee he charges Homer "with a furlt which is most serious, the fault of telling a he, and a bod he, as when he makes an eroneous representation of the nature of the Gods—thows Hophrestic building there his mother, and, on another occasion, Zous sending him flying for taking her part when she was being beaten. Such takes must not be admitted into our State, whether they are supposed to ben in allegorical meaning or not "-18 in 378.

It is not, however, without great reluctance that he thus proceeded him, since in a subsequent pressage he says, "I have always from my callest youth had an ave and love of Honner, which even now makes my words filter on my lips"—Ib ~ 593

P 48 The Staginte is the great philosopher and poetral critic Aristotle, who was born at Stigin, a town of Thrice, is 38; He was the pupil of Plato, and the preceptor of

Alexander the Great

P 40 The 'Cyclops' of Faminads a sepicially interesting to the scholar, as being the only specime of the stry to drawn which has come down to us. "Its distinctive mark," as Schlegol joints out, us. "a chorar consting of styles, who secon jointed with lively senges, pedians and movements, such hoose adventures as were of a more the full him? then there which foured the ordinary subjects of tragedy. "The sature drawn price processed an independent evisitence, it was throw in by way of an appendige, to several tragedies" (Schlege), 'Paramete Laterature,' c v.) The subject of the Cyclops was the all centure of Ulysses with Polyphenus, as decribed in the 'Odresey,' and, after the time of Lumpides, by Lucrun

"Oblever," and, and the time of hempines, by haten 14 of The Adletina —There obleves pick in diames, there which use called the "Attline Fables," the Romans berowel from the O cans, the cagond individuals of Italy. The O cans where language survived only in these faces (efficiently of positive humonity, are at least so men table in the Romans, that then diality was intelligible to the Romans, who completely malamised this divices an among themselves at the festivals. On which a count the actor, whose in galler profession it was to exhabit the Adelman Tables," stood except a privileged persons from the infami titrahid to other theritaris attists, namely, exclused from the tribute of the action, and the production of the country of an immunity from multary service—Greek Theater, exited by Prof. Domaidson, day vii p Soil

In these Ataliano faires no perhaps have the earliest germ of the Commedia dell' Arti, of the improvisatory faire with standing unal 5-16

Ib Inherius The protects, as preserved by Macrobius, was—

"Multos tunent necesse est, quem multi timent"
He needs must fear who makes all others fear

Houses speaks disparaguighy of his phys or farces, which he calls munit, and says he does not admire

" Nec Laberi munos ut publica pecmata marer"

P 50 Therpt. It is singular that Goldsmith omits the first bine of the passage which he quotes, and which attributes to Thespis the credit of having devised a wholly noted entition ment. The control of "Ignorum trigue genns michise Camena Dicitur," de

"Thespee is said to have decised a haid of poetry previously unknown". In other respects this shetch of the use of Gragly and Councily is as accounte as it is briefy the however, to point out that Dougsius is but mother hand of Bucchins, specially applied to that god as the purron denty of the dramatic fishings.

P 52 The Margites was a satire lather on a fool than on a rogue. Four lines of it have been preserved by Plate or πόλλ' ηπίστατο έργα, ι ακῶς δ' ηπίστατο πάντα, "He knew many arts, but knew them all bully,"

Aristotle, one of which,

Fabrile is the word constantly used by Horace for a drawn whithey inche or comba.

NOTES 197

found in the 'Alcibrailes' of Plate, is the first description on record of a "Jack of all trades, but master of none" No one, however, regards the poom as a genuine work of Hower In deed, ettile is essentially the work of an artificial and compilerated state of conety

P 52 Enpois and Centinuans poined with Austophanes in the quotation from Horace which follows — And of them Schlegel aya "The old criters were of opinion that Cistimiz was provided in this bring satis within makes it eatack which disguise, but that he was debicent in pleasant humon, "while "Papoles, they fell us, was agreetible in his poles, and ingenious in covest allwines, but desicant in sature power But Austophanes they add, by a happy medium unted the excellence of both, "Le

<sup>47</sup> The most hopourble testimony in favour of Austophians is that of the sign Pitia, who in an equipmen asys third. Be Graces chose his soul for their abode, who was constantly reading him, and transmitted The Glouds, the very plantly in which, with the merkes of the Sophists, philosophy itself, and were his mastel Scortes, as atticked, to Donysius the clader, with the remit, that from it he would be best able to understand the state of things at Athess "D-Dram Int e xii."

Alcibrades and Peticles are too prominent characters in lthenian history to make it necessary here to explain who they were

ESSAY IX

P 56 Micharl Lagsia, the great architect, painter and sculptor of the sutcernit century, is classed by Riyion in his letters, and also in his 'Childe Huold' (1v 54), with Machievelli, Galileo, and Allicia as the four whose "tember make Sunta Cook (the cathedril in Rivence) the Westmisster Abbor of Lago,"

To Lully was a musical composer, who was horn at Florence in 1634, but who settled at Pins, where he was appointed musicing to the court of Louis AIV, and director of the open

He dad in 1687

P 57 Polybine, though an Acheran, and writing only in Greek, is the most trustworthy historian of the great Punic wer

s the most trustmorthy historian of the great Punic war

Ib Live, it need built be said, was the great historian of

Live, it need in only be said, was the great historium of Rome, and one of the clint filtering romanents of the Angontun age, though some start cuttes accessed his style of what they called Patavarity, in often words, forms of cypression which savonred not so much of Rome, as of Patavium, the modern Pacha, of which he was a native.

In The Pedins of David are, however, universally behaved to have "had the advantage of versification" in their original language

To XY, Crite from ste Macpheron has just published a small volume, entitled, 'Programs at ancient Poetry translated from the Gaelie or Erse language,' which, two or three years later, he followed up with the publication of an entire opic poom, named 'Fingal,' which he affirmed that he had translated from a genuine work of an ancient poet, named Ossian The genumeness of the poem (of which, as Johnson points out, Letter to Boswell, dated Feb 7, 1775, the original manu scripts had never been shown ) was from the first doubted, and by most people the opinion of Walter Scott on the subject will he considered decisive on that point. As is well known, his prejudices were all in favour of trenthing connected with the ancient poetry of the intion , and in a letter to Miss Seward (dated 1805, and given at length by Lockhart in his ' lafe,' c viv ), he tells us that he had attentively considered the subject, and," after making every allowance for the disadvintages of a literal translation he is compelled to admit that incalculably the greater part of the English translation must be ascribed to Macpherson himself , and that his whole introduction, notes, &c , at a an absolute tissue of forgeries " It chould, however, in furness he added that the present Professor of Poetry at Oxford, Dr Shairp, seems hardly willing to embiace so unfavourable an opinion without some deduction

P 61 "The memory of Mr. Pope" Dr. Bentlev's opurion, as expressed to Pope humself, "A pietty poem, Air Pope, but you must not call it Homei," expresses a the judgment that probably every one qualified to judge of the original his formed of the trushtion. Pope, indeed, is generally believed to have had

but a very slight knowledge of Greek

Esgay X

This is one of Goldsmith's litest essays, published in the Westmuster Magazane' for 1773. Shenstone had died in 176°, at the age of forty-aight, but his poetry is of a terr unferno class. He, perhaps, once his admission by Johnson into his list of British poets to the fact of his having been, like the hographer himself, a member of Fembroke Gollage, Oxford, but even Johnson admits that of his poems "had council think any excellent," he was, however, at heat as additited to landscape gardening as to poetry, of which colonion remarks that "pechaps smaller and suity speculator may dimit it inther the aport than the hearists of fact by the cut which he relates, that he so ochusisted his membr by the cut-bell his relates, that he so ochusisted his membr by the cut-bell his relates, that he so ochusisted his membr by the cut-bell of his relates, that he so ochusisted his membr by the cut-bell his relates, that he so ochusisted his membr by the cut-bell his relates, that he so ochusisted his membr by the cut-bell his relates, that he so ochusisted his membr by the cut-bell his relates, that he so ochusisted his membr by the cut-bell his relates, that he so ochusisted his membr by the cut-bell his relates, but "when he seems home from his walks he might find his floors flooded by a shower through the brokes rout' — Luvas gibt Pecks, vol V.

In his 'Cariosities of Laterature,' vol. 1 p 90, Mr Districh

NOTES 199

complants of Johnson's sketch of Shenstone, as very unfairly disparaging his poetical tallents. And, with reference to his taste for gradering, which is the subject of Goldsmith's essay, gives him the credit of hiring "in diversinging his fine pastoni ideas in the 'Jeasowes', edicated the nation into that trisle for landscape gardening which has become the model of all Europe. Recently, Punkmonte his taked the taste of Pigiliak gadeling to Shenstone A man of genus sometimes recirce from foreigners, who are placed out of the prejudices of his compatriox; the traductor posterior;

ESSAY XI

Compare Pope's praise of the spader's skill -

"The spider's touch, how exquisitely fine, Feels at each thread, and lives along the line" Essay on Man, 1 217

In the with book of the 'Metamorphoses,' Ovid relates the origin of the spider in one of his most evquisite descriptions, Arachne, 'alhistmous for skill not for her birth,' was the daughter of a dyer of Colophon, in Asia Minor, and, as Minerva was informed, reguled herself as equal to the goddess in the work of the needle , Minerva disguised herself as an old woman and challenged her to a competition of skill Mmerva's embroidery represented the bull of Mars at Athere, and twelve deries attend there in judgment, with Jupiter as their president Arichne printed the stones of Europa, Ledi, Danie and other objects of Jupiter's leve Her work was so admirable that neither Minerya nor Envy itself could find aught to dispurage in it. The godders was indignant at thus having failed to surpass her , tore her work to pieces, and with a blow in the forehead changed her into a spider, in which form "antiquas exercet aranea telas," she still weaves her webs By a family of illustrious Scotchmen, the spider is held in even greater honour than her equality with Minerva could have earned for her, from the legend of Bruce, who, while undering in the wilds of Curick, after his defeat in Avishire. and the evecution of his brother found shelter on one occasion in a decerted but , unable to sleep, his attention was attracted by aspider which was endeavouring to reach a rafter in the roof, but six times fuled in its exertions. The seventh effort surcreded, and the little insert attached its thin ad to the moint at which it had so often and fruitlessly aimed. And then Bruce to offected, that he himself had been six times defeated, and he regarded the spider's success in its seventh attempt as an omen that he too might find a seventh enterprice successful He raised a fresh army, with which he defeated Lord Pembroke at London Hill and had the foundation of his country's tem porary independence, and from that day no one of the name of Bruce will ever Lill a spider

ESSAY AIII

We as here introduced to the 'Constanna' in Block,' whese theretes is described at some length in two spits generally Of the green and the profession of the

"The sacristans now are forbidden to it

For what Mr. Hume calls a most scandalous fax."

Incolaigh Legard.

ASSIT XIV

P of "Man, for is born to instructions," Le Compute Popus decouption of the greatest trial that can hafull and be endured in patience by a female collector of curronities—

"Mistics of herself, though chura fall "
Moral Figure, 11 268

1.00 XV

Has humanity to foreignes, even then we have been at variant three course, no review for the therm the great may be town to lightly and because, from 1700 to 1515, when not only did Bath, sense of an around farty process only either for the appoint of the breigh constant, but the generator of a support of conditions for the super party with the property of when there were then make for foreign the conditions for involving most condition of a bourd by all "of which has produced may be foreign the foreign the produced may be produced may be produced to the produced may be party and the reddill mexers veryly operation of the party and their skill for every veryls operation, the party that their the total closen mobiling the control for the party and their the total closen mobiling the control for the party and the foreign mobiling the control foreign and the party of the first party may be foreign and the control foreign mobiling the control for the party of the first party may be foreign and the control foreign mobiling the control for the party of the first party may be foreign and the control foreign mobiling the control for the control foreign mobiling the control for the control foreign mobiling the control foreign mobiling the control foreign mob

EASALS XVI, XVII

This description of the father of the Men is Black is under took to have been taken, in many of its muderts, from the character and situation of Goldsmith's own father. In that respect it resembles the pactures he draw of Dr Prumora in the opening chapters of the "Fixer of Wickefeld," and the resistance of the Man in Black to the proposal that he should become a clera, man was a representation of at last some of the considerations which comforted Goldsmith Innwell when the Black Found in the Men is a fixer of the considerations which comforted Goldsmith Innwell when the Black Found in the Men is the consideration of the second of the consideration of the confideration of the second of the consideration of the second of the second of the contraction of the second of the second of the second of the George trunceters when the second of the secon

ESSAY AVIII

In the ugeauty of ins allegers of aldeauth must be admitted to have fully equalled Addison, as well as in the cut with which he makes each fiction the visible of a monal become we have a single of the control of the

P 110 "Tacitis decentus" Virgil adds Averno (Æn vi 126) Dryden trusdates the passage in a phrase strikingly adapted to the warming Goldsmith manus to incule it.

'The gates of hell are open night and day "

ESSAY XIX

P 113 The Zudau she of Zorosatar The Zondavich, so mean of from "Zend," the untant language of Perus, uns the work in which Zorosofer, the Perusan language of union in uniquity, expounded has system of philosophy, which dividue (* 111) electrics as a hold rituspit to recommend, the existence of earl with the offin his of a bruthen singon more of the world.

J. "In "The "Phyticals" Congrary Ord Med 1 35

'Nondum exercism', programm at viseret orbem Montibus, in liquides grans de cenderet audes Nullaque mo tals proter sur l'tors passuit" I can slated by Dryden-

"Happy mortals, unconcern'd for more, Confin'd their wishes to their mater e shore "

T-94. 37

P 120 "A man of the fir 'quality," d. This refers to the case of Eul Petrers, a man in whom an hibrinal fury of ill temper almost amounted to incently, and who had recently been hanged for the murder of his steward

"The neighbouring country" means France, and "thep-ison still alive" means the Count de Charolas We read in one of Walpole's letters (date Oct 23, 1752), "The Count de Charolais shot a president's [se a president of one of the chambers of the parliament] dog, who lives near him The president im-mediately posted to Versulles to complain The king promised him justice, and then sent to the count to desire he would give him two good dogs The prince picked out his two hest. The king sent them to the prosident with this motto on their collars-papartiens as so: "There," said the king, 'I believe he won t shoot them now " And to this preside Lord Dover, in his edition of the letters, appended the following note - "Charles de Bourbon, Count de Charolas, next brother to the Due de Bourbon who succeeded the Regent d'Orleans as Prime Minister of Liance. The Count was a man of infamous character, and committed more than one murder When Long XV purdened him for one of these atracities he said to him, I tell you furly, that I will also pardon any man who murders you. But it may be doubted whether the expression 'pardon' is entirely applicable, since Licretelle, though he mentions the saying of the lang which Lord Dover quotes, adds 'Co fut est certamement mexici; une grace suppo une accusation, un procès, un jugement ; on n'en trous " point de trace à l'egard du Comte de Charolus "-Hi t de Irane pendant le 18me niele, I vi vol ii p 50

HAZ TAPET

Prior remarks that "the paper, to creditable to Goldenith's observation and sadgement, estic retords explains [among other thing -] what his ever been, and is to this day, a course of worder to foreigner, the resuming improvity efford. I to political demagagues, and the little alarm excited by popular tunnits in England The same I unlish for low is the subject of one of his termost pragramen in "The Traceller," where he aported 10 10 11 --

> There, I we low, greath the properties I has a Those are the . . harm that dayle as I and ar

NOTES. 203

ESSAY XXIII

The great Emperor of Russia is Peter the Great, who was born in 1672, succeeded his brother Ivan in 1696, and, though his reign did not last thirty years, since he died in 1725, had made in that comparatively short time great progress in the task he set before himself of curlising his subjects and developing the resources of his empire, thus Trying the foundation of the power which during the list hundred years Russia has since exercised in Emone

P 133 "The German empire appears . . on the eve of dissolution " We must remember that this letter was written in the middle of the seven years' war which Prusna, with the aid of England, was waging against the empire. The mediction. evidently dictated by Goldsmith's elem perception of the meni able weakness of the unperial constitution, does credit to his penetration, though he could not have foreseen the conquests of Napoleon, which were the immediate causes of the dissolu tion of the empure

But the paingriph which speaks of the progress towards ficidom which the French were making is a far more icmarkable instance of his political sagarity and foresight. It has often been cited as a proof of Lord Chesterheld's acutences of obser vation that he had made a similar prediction. In one of the letiers to his southe recommends him "to attend purioularly to the affans of France They grow screens," says he, "and in my opanion will grow more so every day The people are noor conrequently discontented. These who have icligion are divided in their notions of it, which is saying that they hate

The umy must, without doubt, take (in then own minds at leist) different puts in all these disputes The French nation icasons freely, which they never did before, upon matters of religion and government, and begin to be entenuiteate, to have got rid of their prepulses. short, all the symptoms which I have ever met with in lustory previous to great changes and revolutions in government now exist and darly increase in France" The two passages well discree to be compared, but in comparing them it must be borne in mind that Lord Chesterfield was a veterin statesman. trained from his earliest manhood in political affairs, and that Goldsmith had had no such advantage Compare also Gold smith's description in 'The Traveller' of the light, fivolous, though attractive character of the French people generally, and with the next paragraph, where he pronounces the Dutch "no longer the sons of freedom, but of avance," compare the lines of the same poum -

"Industry begets a love of gram,
Then much low'd wealth imparts,
Consence, plenty, elegance, and arts,
But near them closer, waft and fraud anyear,
Ev'n liberty, itself as barter'd here?

LISSAY XXVI.

P 143 "Fortune receives an accompanying radustry" Compare Horace.—

"Te semper untert seem necessitas"—Od 1 35, 13
Necessity precedes Fortune by compelling man to industry

ESSAN ANVII

P 150 "If you would find the golders of Grace," &c Compace Tribullus --

"Talis in actorno felix Vertumaus Olympo, Mille habet ornatus, mille decenter habet "-u 4 14

"So the happy Vertunious has a thousand forms, but all becoming and graceful"

Essay XXIX

Mt Proor quotes an article in the "Edinburgh Review," on Sit George Stunton's jushication of the 'Penal Code of the Cliniest, which especially commends the clearness and consenses of the Chinese law, "savouring throughout of practical judquant and European good series". But this essay, now, perhaps than any other written in the whole century, proves the written to have been in advance of his age. For the maxim, which in it he lawe down, that while "penal laws seemie property in a state, they also drammsh personal security in the same properties," and that "a multitudie of sevene laws "rais to mercise the means of satisfying periors," was not adopted as the principle of our penal legislature till the viry and of the region. Our zoolo man, indeed, too truly will to be unition in consecution of the name propose came of Romally and Machine and consecution of the apprix, that it is, now among the most mental in Orbitestadon.

ESSAY XXXI

P 101 "I fancy the character of a poet is an energy country the same" Mi Prior remarks that this "sketch is di win, no doubt, from Goldsmith's own character, and certainly with strong points of resemblance"

10 Plantas and Terence were writers of comedica at Rome, but none of their works are original, then drames are only what Schlegel calls "translations or recasts of Greek works." he adds, truly, that they are "negligent in their versification." and that "their language, at least that of Plantus, is deficient

NOTES 205

in cultivation and polish "-Diam Let c 14

P 162 Bocthius is called by Gibbon "the last of the Romans whom Cato or Tully could have acknowledged for their countryman" He was a senator who in the reign of Theodoric (A D 493-526) filled more than one honourable office in the state Being accused of treason and thrown into mison at Pavia, he employed his leisure with composing a work which he entitled The Consolution of Philosophy," "a golden volume not unworthy of the lessure of Plato or Tully The writings of the philosopher were translated by the most glorious of the English kings " (Alfred ) 'Decline and Fall,' e viviv Dr Johnson, while he pronounced him rather a philosopher than a Christian (Boswell's 'Life,' ann 1770), yet thought highly enough of his work to uige Mis Carter to retianslate it

Ib Tasso Compue Byron

"And Tasso is their glory and their shame. Hark to lus stran, and then smyey his cell'

P 163 Certuates The mention of Certantes, the immortal anthor of 'Don Quivote,' shows that the title of this letter, 'Anecdotes of Poets,' ought to be enlarged. And indeed the addition of the name of Vaugelas, celebrated in Molicie's ' Femmes Savantes,' who can enquie nothing

"Qui en termes expres condamne Vangelas," and of Cassandie, a translator of some of Aristotle's worls, whom Boileau makes apeat of himself

"Je sms rustique et fier, et j'ar l'âme grossière,"

an avowel which may well explain his poverty, shows that he was led, as he wrote on, to i tend his list to every class of litei irv men

Of Butler, the author of 'Hudibras,' Goldsmith had a pu ticular admiration, and in an elaborate acview of his workranked him on a level with, if not above, Swift as a humorist

Logay XXXIV.

This letter is remarkable for the union which it displays of sound philosophy and practical signesty with views which can hardly be reguded as having any foundation but a strange credulity To learn from the wisdom of other nations was placed by the was Homer in the year front of the advantageous results derived by Ulysses from his protracted wanderings And to travel in order to enlarge the minds of his countrymen by an acquaintance with arts new to them, but practised in distant lands, and in return to diffuse European Knowledge among peoples to whom the conforts on stateness of the Westma as yet unknown, wan entriprise at once philosophical and humane But, though each succeeding generation is so ferthe in inventions that it seems hazardous to pronounce any discovery beyond the reach of human ingenuity, it is not easy to read without a sindle scatteness implying a belief in "the power of the Asiatics in producing winds, or lunging down rain".

It is remoth the that halve or that lean years after the pulheation of this letter, Dr. Johnson miged upon the great Gournor-Gineral of Indry, Writen Histories, a consideration of the advantages to be derived from an investigation of the "arts and opinions of a noo of men from whom very little had hither to bean derived," nontaining expensilly "acts of main facture practices in the continues under Hasting's Government, as yet impelledty known in England either by artifices on philosophias." And it is no minister to Johnson to suppose that his aggentess for such inquiries was in some digree dictated by a recollection of this letter of Goldsmit.

And a century ago it would certainly have council oven more remulable, if, as we have even in this generation, one of those whose tratels have been most extended, embracing the whole continent of North America, Palestine, and Hindostan, had been the hen of the British Crown, the lutius Sovenign

P 173 Genelli Genelli was a Neupolitan, who in the last

If NY General General was a Newpoltan, who in the last years of the 17th century published a nurative of a veyage cound the world, which is here mentioned as having been generally discretized by the learned men of the next generation. But in the pieceat century the man who of all others has been the best qualified to form an opinion, Buton Humboldt, has affirmed in the most positive manuer his conviction of the truth of all General is statement.

Lepan VXX A

The practice of promoting every variety of object, municipal, sentitie, or charable, by large dimners is a vergorously main tained as ever. But the election treating, the residual promotion of the continuation of the modern characteristic and the modern characteristic continuation of the modern continuation, but too often tunned the conditions, but too often tunned the candidates tightly, and fixed in the same manner to the wall as before

In this manner it spins and fixes several threads prullel to each other, which, so to speak, serve as the warp to the intended web. To form the woof, it spins in the same manner its thread, transversely mang one end to the first thread that was spin, and which is always the strongest of the whole web, and the other to the wall. All these threads, being newly spin, are glutanous, and therefore stick to each other whelever they happen to touch, and in those parts of the web most exposed to be torn, our natural artist strengthens them, by doubling the threads sometimes saxfold.

Thus far naturalists have gone in the description of this animal, what follows is the result of my own observation upon that species of the insect called a house spider. I perceived, about four years ago, a lirge spider in one corner of my room, making its web, and, though the mand frequently levelled her fatal broom against the labours of the little animal, I had the good fortune then to prevent its destruction, and, I may say, it more than paid in the three days the web was, with merediable diling three days the web was.

entertainment it afforded.

In three days the web was, with incredible diligree, completed, nor could I avoid thinking, that the insert seeined to exult in its new abode. It frequently triversed it round, examined the strength of evry part of it, retired into its hole, and came out ears frequently. The first enemy, however, it had to encounter, was another and a much larger spider, which, hiving no web of its own, and having probably eshausted all its stock in former labours of this kind, cume to inserde the property of its neighbour Soon, then, a terrible encounter ensued, in which the invader seemed to have the victory, and the laborious spider was obliged to take refuge in its hole. Upon this I perceived the victor using every art to draw the enemy from his stronghold. He seemed to go off, but quickly returned, and when he found all arts in vain, began to destroy the new web without meloy. This brought on another battle, and, contrary to my expectations, the laborious spider became conqueror, and fairly killed his antagomist.

Now, then, in peaceable possession of what was justly its own, it waited three days with the utmost impatience, repairing the bleacher of its web, and taking no sustenance that I could perceive. At last, however, a large blue fly fell into the snare, and struggled hard to get loose. The spider gave it leave to entangle itself as much as possible, but it seemed to be too strong for the column I must own I was greatly surprised when I saw the spider immediately sally out, and in less than a minute weave a now net round its captive, by which the motion of its wings was stopped, and when it was fairly hampered in this manner, it was served and dragged into the hole

In this manner it lived, in a precarious state, and nature seemed to have fitted it for such a life, for upon a single fly it subsisted for more than a week I once put a wasp into the net, but when the spider came out in order to seize it as usual, upon perceiving what kind of an enemy it had to deal with, it instantly broke all the bands that held it fast, and contributed all that lay in its power to disengage so formidable an antagonist. When the wasp was at librity, I expected the spider would have set about repairing the breaches that were made in its net, but those, it seems, were intenable, wherefore the colowed was now entirely forsaken, and a new one begun, which was completed in the usual time.

I had now a mind to try how many cobwebs a spider could furnish, wherefore I destayed this, and the insect set about another. When I destayed the other also, its whole stock seemed entuely exhausted, and it could spin no more. The arts it made use of to support itself, now departed of its great means of subsistence, were mided surprising. I have seen it roll up its legs like a bill and he motionless for hours together, but cautiously matching all the time when a fly happened to once, and often seize its prey.

Of this life, however, it soon began to grow we'ry, and resolved to invade the possession of some other spider, since it could not make a web of its own It formed an attack upon a neighbouring fortifica tion with great vigour, and at first was as vigorously repulsed Not daunted, however with one defeat, in this manner it continued to by siege to another's web for three days, and at length, having killed the defendent, actually took possession. When smaller flics bappen to fall into the snare, the spider does not sally out at once, but very patiently wants till it is sure of them, for, upon his immediately approveling, the terror of his appearance might give the captive strength sufficient to get loose the manner then is to wait principly till, by ineffectual and impotent struggles, the captive his wasted all his strength, and then he becomes a certain and easy conquest

XI]

The insect I am now describing lived three years; every year it changed its skin, and got a new set of legs. I have sometimes plucked off a leg, which grew again in two or three days. At first it dreaded my approach to the web, but at last it became so familiar as to take a fly out of my hand, and upon my touching any part of the web, would immediately leave its hole, prepared either for a defence or in attack.

To complete this description, it may be observed, that the male spaders are much less than the female, and that the latter are oviparous. When they come to lay, they spread a part of their web under the eggs, and then roll them up carefully, as we roll up things in a cloth, and thus hatch them in their hole. If disturbed in their holes, they never attempt to escape without carrying this young brood in their forceps away with them, and thus frequently are secrificed to their parental affection.

As soon as ever the young ones leave their artificial covering, they begin to spin, and almost acceptly seem to grow bigger If they have the good fortune, when even but a day old, to catch a fly, they fall to with good appetites, but they have sometimes three or four days without any sort of sustenance, and yet still continue to grow larger, so as every day to double their former size. As they grow old, however, they do not still continue to microse, but their legs only continue to grow longer, and when a spider becomes entirely stiff with age, and unable to seize its prey, it dies at length of hunger.